

ADAM

FACT • FICTION • HUMOR

2/-

JUNE, 1961

Printed at the GPO, Sydney. For transmission by post as a periodical.

THE SPURT TIGER

single 30

ADAM

JUNE • 1961

VOL. 31, No. 1

-ACT-

They Will By Night	5
Let Us Oval	There's No More Art	19
Will O' The Dog Diggers	14
The Hot Night In Dixie	26

FICITION

The Comeback	9
Appointment In Tonga	10
The Silent Tiger	20
The Gun That Failed	25

FEATURES

The Up	31
Couture	8, 9, 12, 13, 18, 19, 24, 25, 26, 30, 31, 32, 34, 35, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46

by Gordon Price (See Job, Work, Part II, page 19) 10
by John G. Nichols 11
by John G. Nichols 12
by John G. Nichols 13
by John G. Nichols 14
by John G. Nichols 15
by John G. Nichols 16
by John G. Nichols 17
by John G. Nichols 18
by John G. Nichols 19
by John G. Nichols 20
by John G. Nichols 21
by John G. Nichols 22
by John G. Nichols 23
by John G. Nichols 24
by John G. Nichols 25
by John G. Nichols 26
by John G. Nichols 27
by John G. Nichols 28
by John G. Nichols 29
by John G. Nichols 30
by John G. Nichols 31
by John G. Nichols 32
by John G. Nichols 33
by John G. Nichols 34
by John G. Nichols 35
by John G. Nichols 36
by John G. Nichols 37
by John G. Nichols 38
by John G. Nichols 39
by John G. Nichols 40
by John G. Nichols 41
by John G. Nichols 42
by John G. Nichols 43
by John G. Nichols 44
by John G. Nichols 45
by John G. Nichols 46

ADAM MAGAZINE PTY. LTD., SYDNEY
PRINTERS: GORDON & GOTCH LTD., MELBOURNE • ADAM MAGAZINE PTY. LTD., SYDNEY

The Comeback

I was sure this was the man who had killed my father. If I could prove it I'd be made . . . and his daughter ruined.

IT was my last chance and Hannon, my last, the Chief Editor, made dinner sure I knew it.

"MacLean," he told me in a voice hard speech to crack a rock. "We carried you for three years now and I'm tired of it! You're not a top feature-writer now. You can't trade on that any longer. One more paper and you're through for good."

I was still sick and shaking from my last bout with the bottle. They'd hospitalized me. It had really scared the hell out of me. I'd had green dogs in my bed. I was willing to eat humble pie right now. I needed a job, preferably my old job on the paper. The AA people had recommended I find something I could really get my teeth into. Without some definite purpose I was finished.

I was going to make a comeback, climb all the way back up the ladder to the top where I'd been standing before the affair with Wilma had pushed me off.

My first assignment was pretty meager and disappointing. I was to go 70 miles down the coast to a Native town and get a story about the sand bar in the river estuary there. The bar had grounded or capsized more than a dozen trawlers during the last seven months. It had claimed three boats in the last 18 days so that made it news. Writing it up would be little more than stringing the facts together.

"Sister of Audrey, Child!" I couldn't help hearing again.

"No — If you gave right away you ought to be back by tonight. We'll hold the paper for the weekend papers. Let's see if you've still got the old touch, MacLean."

I was suddenly enthusiastic about the job.

"Audrey, Child. Suppose I go out in a cruiser myself? I could do an 'I-happened-to-meet' piece on R. Child. Give it a real personal touch. It would generate so much the better."

"We might turn head over kettle," he warned.

"Well, I can swim a bit. What does it say? I need two days, Child. Just two days!"

He stared at me silently for a long moment. "A man's a man for striking his neck out — okay? Two days? No more?"

The fisherman whose trawler had been capsized the day before was named Lambert, a sunburned rosy faced guy with a drawl and a ready smile. I interviewed him at the home of Vern Larson, another fisherman with whom Lambert stayed. Lambert was engaged to Larson's daughter, Fay, a blue-eyed, tanned, blonde-haired smiling beauty who worked on her father's trawler.

But it wasn't Fay or Lambert who interested me so much as Larson himself. He was an average-sized black in his early 30's with cropped white hair and clear blue eyes. There was a deep scar stretching from under his right ear, down into the nape of his fish-smelling sweater. This was a man — a mormon — scratching the back of his leather neck bracelet the interlocked fingers around, up and over the left ear, across the cheek and finally winding over the top of the neckline once — started me thinking.

Twenty years ago I'd seen a man with a heavily-bandaged neck like that same mormon. It had been in the Perth Criminal Court. The man was on trial for murder. But his name wasn't Larson and he wasn't a Mormon.

He was Doctor Oscar Ericson, father of a two-year-old girl with blonde curly hair and round blue eyes. He was also the slayer of his wife's lover. Before he'd died with Ericson's bullet in him, the lover had managed to stab a broken bottle into the doctor's neck. After the shooting, he'd calmly bandaged his neck and driven seven miles to deliver a one-pound baby.

The police thought they had him cold but at the last minute, on the stand, his wife had refused to give evidence against him. The prosecutor had no case without her testimony and they couldn't force her to give it. The case against Ericson collapsed. He was discharged through lack of evidence. It caused a nation-wide sensation at the time. Ericson cleared all along he was innocent, that he'd been miles away at the time of the shooting and had injured his neck in a minor motor accident. But everyone knew he'd done the shooting. It just shouldn't be proved against him.

He caused another sensation right after the trial by disappearing and taking his two-year-old daughter with him. He apparently vanished from the face of the earth. No one had seen or heard of him since.

I remembered these happenings well although I'd only been a 14-year-old cub at the time I had reason to remember — Mrs. Ericson's lover had also been my father.

This fisherman with his scarred, calloused hands and leathery skin, in no way resembled the sharp Doctor Ericson. My dad then had been a bit of a wanker, hadn't lived with my mother for years before the Ericson affair. There was no love lost between us but now, having the man I believed to be his father, I realized how the story could give me a short-cut back to the top.

The thought brought me out in a cold sweat.

"Just a little more background, Mr. Larson," I said, notebook poised. The three of them sitting stiffly in the parlor of the weatherboard house. "Where did you originally come from?"

Larson's eyes twinkled at me. "Wait a minute now, Mr. Marlowe. I thought it was Ann's story you wanted."

"Well, you've just been telling us your experiences with the bar over the years, Mr. Larson. I'd like to include them in the article . . . You've been a fisherman all your life?" My mouth was dry, no body temperature.

"For 45 years, anyway." He relaxed a bit, thinking he had me off the subject of where he'd come from. He had his story off pat. "We fished everything from 'kooka to whale."

"Whales, too, eh? — where'd you hunt them off West Australia?"

"Why the hell Wa?" he asked in such a curt tone that both Fay and Lambert frowned at him pensively.

"Well, not too long back that was Australia's only decent whaling ground. I thought you were referring to your younger days."

"I was," he said more quietly, modified at my simple explanation. But I knew now he was touchy about references to West Africa. "But I hunted in the Antarctic, out of Hobart."

"Thank you, Miss place. Your home State?"

(Continued on page 24)

He was alone in the immensity of wild Africa at night . . . man-eaters prowl and hunting for food . . . He remembered the unfinished warning: "It's dangerous because . . .!"

THEY

ALAN Johnson had been forced to agree with his professional hunter, Harry Walker, about his wish to spend a night alone, except for his gun-hunter, Mafikeni, in a sardine on the veldt. The older man, indubitably more experienced, had hesitated quietly, uttering a word of protest now and then. In the end he had reluctantly agreed, sensing, perhaps, his client's need to prove to himself that he could go it alone.

"This is good game country," Harry had remarked. "You'll see three, all right. But it's dangerous because . . ." The words had trailed off and Harry had shrugged his shoulders, giving up the argument.

Crouched low and silent that night on the blanket in the center of the barricade of thorn bushes which enclosed the two men, Alan wondered why Harry had not finished his last sentence.

Without warning, dry leaves rustled beyond the barricade. There was the softening sound of feet on the bare ground outside.

"Sings-swa." The word was spoken with contempt and loathing.

"Spotted, were they?" He should have guessed. But not knowing and not guessing made Alan realize how much he had to learn about hunting on the veldt of Africa. Unless he could learn to go it alone, away from his peerless rifle and experience of his teacher; to read and interpret sounds and traces; to stand against the charge of furious animals, without the comforting knowledge that no other factor could better what was really beside him; he knew that he could never honestly claim to be a big-game hunter.

The sardine was only two miles from the camp which had been pitched beneath the photographic swollen limbs of a monstrous baobab tree. To Alan, however, in the pitch, Mafikeni, the camp seemed almost in another world.

Low, hoarse, warorous sounds floated from the area around the tent. The hyenas cackled and whined and Alan could hear them clawing on meat and hide and pulling at the carcass and cracking bones with their powerful jaws. All that he could see were darker, more solid blobs of darkness scuttling warily in the night.

Reaching, Alan touched Mafikeni and roused for the tenth. Sensing what Alan wanted, Mafikeni placed the hilt of his hand, whispering, "Not scared. Not afraid."

KILL BY NIGHT

Aiming the light through the park, Alan clicked off the flash. As the silent, pulsing beam lit up the striped body of the zebra, only heavy hoofs turned to face it. The broad, pushed-in snout of the leopard dropped with blood the viscous fluid from the nostrils at which they had been tearing. A chorus of sharp snarls and mirth greeted the light.

Alan clicked off the flash. As he handed it back to Mafeking the tawny burst into their domineering laughter.

Altho' all sounds seemed though he could not see, Alan knew the hyenas had melted away. Utter and complete silence descended on the veldt and the savanna. He knew there must be a reason for the abrupt retreat of the savanna. Was some more powerful animal arriving? Possibly, as though from a great distance, he heard Mafeking's breath like as he drew air into his lungs.

Alan reached for the rifle. As he lifted it the tawny rattled softly and he felt Mafeking lay a restraining hand on his knee and pressed it so it lay warmly. He felt that he wasn't sure the sound was not a dream, of his imagination. Alan tested the ridge of bones and the soft sponge of a dry branch against a hairy fur. A low growl arose from the night only a few feet from the savanna. A cold shiver ran over Alan and his grip on his rifle tightened so that his knuckles ached.

For what seemed an eternity there were no further sounds. Then the chain rattled down the veldt. Alan heard an animal roll into the light and the chain rattled again as whatever it was that was rolling tapped at the savanna and ripped out a pony chunk of flesh. There was a chattering sound and then a sort of gurgling gurgle as the feeding animal boiled down the road.

Mafeking leaped forward and whispered close into Alan's ear:

"Savanna!" Leopard!

Excitement surged through Alan. He had never shot a leopard.

Slowly, with infinite caution, Alan set to one knee so that he was facing the opening in the thorn-bush, knowing from long experience what was expected, yea also had placed himself behind Alan and raised the teeth so that it pointed out the opening from behind and over Alan's right shoulder.

Alan clicked his tongue. Mafeking pushed the hilt of the bush and a beam of white, brilliant light streamed from the savanna and illuminated the bay. The black and white stripes of the zebra showed sharp and clear.

The leopard was lying by the hindquarters in the beam the black rosette stood out sharp and clean against the tawny body. Its long, thick tail lay stretched on the ground. It lay motionless except as the leopard turned its round head and stared at the savanna. The burning glow in the eyes paled as its gaze at the interruption of its meal intensified. The hard, black edges of its lips curled, showing the powerful teeth streaked red with blood. The short, stiff hairs protruding on top of its broad, pushed-in muzzle were streaked with blood. A throaty growl rumbled from its half-open mouth.

As Alan pulled the front sight down on the "U" of the rear sight so that just the fore foot showed, he saw the molars in the leopard's hindquarters root and tear and knew that it was about to spring. Calm now that he was facing neither than running about his adversary, Alan squared, taking up the short stock in the trigger.

There was a streak of orange fire. The report of the powerful rifle cracked out of the savanna and rolled across the veldt.

For a brief moment, while the bullet whizzed from the muzzle, the leopard lay motionless as if it had neither heard nor felt the shot. Then blood rushed from its mouth, its head sank to the ground and the leopard rolled on its side, its hind legs twitching, then stiffening as in a mighty stretch. Its jaws slackened as a last, wrenching breath left its body and its savage spirit departed.

Mafeking let out a pleased whoop of pleasure and Alan, turning with a grin on his face, offered his hand and the two shook, congratulating each other.

Mafeking pushed out the thick thorn bush which had been used to close the entrance to the savanna. Alan handed him the torch and held his rifle in his right hand. As they stepped from the safety of the thorn-bush, Mafeking swung the beam of the torch on to the veldt. The bulky form of a hyena loomed in the light and then the animal collapsed away. Eyes, so pale, glowed and shone in the beam as the native rapidly played it about.

When he grasped a forepaw and tried to turn the leopard, with Mafeking nuzzling the hindquarters, Alan found the animal heavier than expected. The paw slipped through his hand and he quickly grabbed his pistol in the air to get a better grip, and having struggled, beating the carcass against the ground, the two men hurried to lie the leopard to safety. Around them the savanna pressed in close and their graves dispensed. Savanna, choking mucus burst from the micti as Mafeking tried to pierce the light about while hauling on the leopard. With only one hand free, Alan could not use his rifle.

With a group of relief Alan crawled onto the savanna, the thorns tearing at his arms and legs, and started to bring the leopard in. Mafeking stumbled after and quickly pulled the thorn bush back into place to close the entrance.

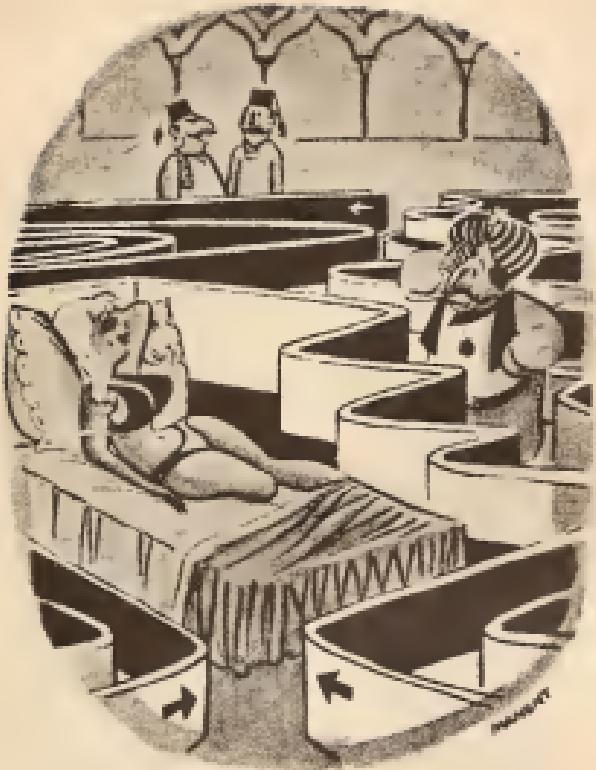

Comparatively safe once more, Alan turned the light on to him. The leopard was a male, large and heavy, and the worn, rather transverse teeth told that it was old. Examining the body to find his bullet hole, Alan thought of the hundreds of antelopes and goats and deer which the leopard must have killed during its life. It had lived to the full of its feline ancestry, maturing and killing whenever in the mood. Alan ran his hands possessively over the bright short fur.

Relatives for the thorn-bush Hawk had thoughtfully filled for him in case, he poured two cups of strong, sweet tea. As they drank he clicked off the torch, and within minutes they heard the hyenas snarling and feeding on the zebra.

Alan unrolled a blanket and spreading a corner of it over the leopard, lay down, resting his head on the body as a pillow and pulling the rest of the blanket over himself and settling down to sleep.

Then silence surrounded him. It was a moment before he realized where he was and why he was asleep. The half-moon was rising and a crescent, wan light diminished the veldt. Every bush and every tall tree cast a long black shadow on the ground. Mafeking was sitting up with his blanket still draped around his shoulders. The chill in the air had increased, but it wasn't the fog that his legs and arms were cold which had awakened Alan.

Mafeking saw that his employer was awake. Turning his dark face toward the hunter, he held his finger against his lips, signaling silence. His gesture could only mean that some animal, some dangerous animal, was very close. Alan felt the pensiveness sputter in his arm-pits and trickle down his ribs before neath his shirt. His heart began to thump wildly and his mouth dried. Had the lions come, he wondered? If they had, were they as near that Mackling dared scarcely move?

"There's always one who likes to play hard-angle."

From a short distance, perhaps 100 yards, a branch was suddenly torn from a tree with a ripping, tearing crash. Alan heard it hit the ground. Only one animal on the world can bear that noise from a tree. An elephant!

Was the elephant alone, or was there a herd with it? No sound the hyenas had gone. All animals, though some not reluctantly, flew away before the elephant.

Like every hunter, Alan had an enormous respect for elephants. He knew them to be temperamental animals which could be stampeded by a sudden noise or an unexpected smell, but also animals which could, under the same conditions, react entirely differently to a noise or a scent with a perverse share of determination and rage.

Another branch was torn from a tree. Closer this time. The elephant, or elephants, were moving slowly across the valley, feeding as they shuffled about.

Then he heard the sound to which Mackling had been listening. The curious, continuous rumblings of an elephant's stomach. Fed hundreds of pounds of partly chewed roots and buds and leaves and grass, the stomachs of elephants generate great quantities of gas and this bubbles and crackles constantly. Listening above the pounding of his heart, Alan heard, and knew that several elephants were coming closer and closer to where he and Mackling crouched behind the pony, invisible barriers of silent.

In the faint light Alan saw Mackling raise his arm and point. Carefully, Alan got to his knees and crawled on the blanket looking over the thorn. For a moment he saw nothing unusual. Then the enormous bulk of an elephant emerged from the shadows and crossed through the thin half-light to another tree. Alan saw its trunk swing upward, exploring the branches. There was a crash as the mighty head stepped backward and uprooted a branch from the tree.

Beyond it Alan could see the dark, ghostly shapes of other elephants. In the uncertain light, as the elephants passed to and fro, it was impossible to count them. But it was not a large herd. Alan guessed the number at around a dozen or 15 adults and half-grown animals. As he watched them, faintly he saw the moonlight play along the curving backs, and when an elephant stepped from beneath a tree the sun light turned its ridge back a brighten grey. Pausing their chores there, running, feeding, the elephants drew closer and closer.

The open riveted on the pink amulet. Alan watched every move. He noticed a call, about thirty and a half feet high, barking back and forth around its bare mother and often encircling between her legs and under her stomach. It wasn't more than 40 yards away.

On one of its scampering forays, the little elephant approached quite close to the amulet. For a short time it stood, its young ears spread, halting. Alan held his breath, praying that it would turn and go back to its mother. Instead, the muley set the better of it. Cautionily it approached the odd heap of thorny bushes which concealed the two hunters.

It came nearer and nearer. Alan hardly dared to breathe as the baby elephant came to the thorn barricade and began to explore it with its little trunk. The inquisitive, delicate tip probed along the thorns. Alan knew it must be scorching them, but the smell of man apparently did not frighten it. He tore his eyes from the ponies to look at the big elephants. They were moving along slowly, 30 to 40 yards distant.

The little elephant stopped tentatively at the thorn bushes forming the barrier. The bush came loose and tumbled to the ground. The baby backed away, a low, rather squeakish rumble sounding from its small throat. Alan's heart slipped and stood still. His eyes flew to the huge elephants. He saw one which he used to be the mother of the youngster, turn and throw out her great ears and stand staring. She had heard her baby and stood instantly ready to charge to its assistance. Several of the other enormous animals stood still, listening.

Alan heard Mackling's breath whistling between his clenched teeth. What between his clenched teeth would the mother elephant come to investigate what had disturbed her child? If she did, what would be their chance of escape alive from her furious anger at discovering humans so close? A cold fear such as he had never known before gripped Alan and he stood frozen in anticipation.

The youngster tested the bush with its trunk and nose closer, butting against the barricade. Its thick trunk, delicate and impulsive, wriggled within a foot of Alan's body. Rigid, he watched the tip expand and contract as the youngster absorbed the smell of his body. He was more frightened than if the protuberant breathing trunk had been the writhing body of a deadly poisonous snake. At any moment the young elephant might trumpet a warning and bring the herd rushing to its rescue. In the midst of his terror, Alan remembered Harry unconscious remark. "It is dangerous because . . ." Now he knew what had worried the experienced hunter. Apparently satisfied with his explorations, the little elephant backed away from the rocks. Alan heard Mabeking let out his part-up teeth in a long, low sigh. As the youngster turned, heading back to its mother, Alan's body went slack.

The youngster joined its mother and disappeared beneath her. The enormous creatures, standing ten-and-a-half to eleven feet at the shoulders, passed slowly across the glistening veldt. The rumblings of their stomachs faded into the night. For perhaps a quarter of an hour Alan heard the occasional rippling snap of a branch being torn from a tree, their silences closed over the veldt. The thin light illuminated the striped carcasses of the antela and the shadows from the trees shortened. The stars twinkled hard and serene far overhead. A long distance away a lyrebird whooped dimly.

Alan and his gunbearer were alone in the midst of the veldt. Alan fished out his watch and looked at it. Another hour and dawn would lighten the sky to the east. The night was almost gone. Striking to his knees he reached for the flask of tea and pouring two cups turned and ran his left hand over the fur of the leopard, now stiff and cold.

The skin, tanned and lying on the floor of his game room at home would, he knew, bring back memories and sensations which he would never be able to communicate to others. He had lived through a night; the memories and emotions of which would always be for him and for Mabeking alone. *

"Through with that!"

"Oh, they're both growing by leaps and bounds since you were here last!"

FACT

A. J. LEKK

LET US OUT

-THERE'S NO MORE AIR!

A FRIGID black night. The three men slogged their way carefully along the narrow ledge just below the top of the cliff. About 50 yards on, they reached a broad shelf covered with a tangle of jungle growth and dense trees.

Major Becker unstrapped the bulky transceiver from his back and slipped it to the grass. The net was early World War II vintage, in the SOS series, truly portable only on the back of a mule. Becker unhooked its flap, ran out the steel antenna and strung it behind a cluster of thick bushes. When his routine test checked out, he strapped back on his pack and crawled at his two companions.

Lieutenant Roy Wilson, the Aussi ex-pilot, was dumping dirt and rubble out of a shale hunched over his tattered patch-glewed helmet. Ramon Cortina, the Filipino guide, grunted and pointed to the blasted-out city of Davao behind them.

"Yeah," Becker added.

That was all he had to say. They knew what they had to do. For almost three years they'd worked together as Allied coast watchers on Mindanao, out of the southernmost islands in the Philippines. The job: to spot and report Japanese naval and shipping activities in the Philippine Sea. They were to stay together — a long time.

Becker, 32, was a civilian. Hired come to the Philippines fresh out of the Colorado School of Mines, on a two-year contract with the Imacon Mineral Corporation to explore for manganese and lead deposits in the Mindanao mountains. When the Japanese attacked Clark Air Field and cut off Mindanao, Becker was recruited by the Allies as a coast watcher.

Roy Wilson, 42, owned a copra plantation on the island. He'd been commissioned a lieutenant in the Australian Army. Ramon Cortina had been Wilson's foreman.

On December 10, 1944, the three were ordered to show up on the port side of Davao and report conditions relevant to the scheduled Allied invasion. Now, well inside the enemy perimeter, Becker pointed to the path heading down the face of the cliff.

"Pick a point down there, Ramon," he said softly.

Cortina nodded and moved off silently.

"I'll take the topside watch," said Wilson, grumbling. He shook his head. "I don't like this, Ellis. We're real goddamn washouts, not b... commanding."

Becker shrugged, and Wilson climbed up to take his post at the top of the cliff. A thin fog rolled in from the sea. It was chilly. Becker pulled a blanket from his pack and wrapped it around his shoulders, but it didn't stop the wet, pell-mell air from biting through him.

Just after 8 a.m., he opened his code book and squinted his first message. From the high cliff, using binoculars, he could see Davao's docks — all destroyed by B-17 bombing attacks. Close to shore were the battered hulls of five partially sunk Japanese transports. On a two-lane dirt road to the west of town, the great frames of abandoned Japanese trucks stuck up out of ditches. About 15 concrete pillboxes remained undamaged on the beach. Shattered wire and steel armband posts — still intact.

Then, just below his immediate position, Becker observed a small-range railroad track that ran into the face of the cliff. The area surrounding it had been bombed heavily. Deep craters pocked the ground and at two or three points the rails were torn and twisted.

No one stirred in Davao itself. The town seemed almost deserted. Becker jotted out his report and the hand-tooled scroll of the top secret dangerous load. He repeated twice and when he signed off, Ramon, crouching low, hurried up the path.

"There's cave down below," the Filipino said, shivering. "I'm cold. You?"

Becker's fingers were so numb by the cold that he was having trouble writing. He decided, "Let's set it in it," he said. "Good place to set it out when the B-17s come in, anyway. Pick up Wilson."

By the time the two returned, Becker had buried his transceiver in the brush. Cortina led them down the cliff side. At the bottom, six small headstones were lying on their sides at the mouth of the cave.

The track actually ran into this cave, the entrance to which had been cleared by man obviously to longer there.

Becker darted across the clearing, ran inside the cave and disappeared. A moment later, he peered out and waved the other two on.

They entered a narrow tunnel. Cortina stepped on his flashlight. The tunnel curved sharply and then opened into a huge vaulted chamber. Narrow tunnels branched off from this main central room. Stacked up in piles were thousands of wooden cartons and burlap bags.

Wilson picked up a corner and pried open a carton. It was filled with cans of tuna fish. They opened other boxes at random and found a variety of vegetables and meat. The boxes were filled with ripe.

"There's enough tinned chow in here to feed the whole city of Davao for a year," Wilson explained. "I don't like this," Cortina whispered. "Why is there no guard?"

"None, Ramon," Becker explained. "With these tracks torn up, they can't move the stuff out too easy."

The sun, climbing over the horizon, cast thin fingers of light into the opening of the cave. Becker took out a small pocket of matches and passed them out. While he remained in his pocket for a instant, a gun shoted in the distance. It became out daily three times in rapid fire.

"An air raid alert," said Cortina. Becker grumbled. "Yeah. And we're a hellfire lot better off in here than hanging on the side of a cliff when those Japs start dropping their bombs around."

He was about to continue when they heard, loud, excited voices at the tunnel entrance — Japanese voices.

"Dance that light!" Becker whispered, pulling the two men behind a stack of cartons. The cave was plunged into absolute darkness. They heard the Japanese march inside — then silence. A glinting of torch light, and dancing shadows flickered across the rough walls. The Japanese walked into a room off the main chamber. In a moment a generator coughed and whirred into action. Lights came on.

The Japanese retreated and,

On December 10, 1944, three coastwatchers, two Japanese and six schoolgirls were buried by bombs in a Mindanao cave. Here, for the first time, are the incredible details of their shocking day-long ordeal.

"I wonder where he gets his inspiration?"

squatting on their heels, talked in their harsh, explosive language. There were two of them. A few minutes later, an elderly couple raced into the cave. They panted for breath and began speaking Tagalog. They were pleased by the latest Allied bombing raid.

"Maybe in a few weeks," the old man crooned, "we will be blessed."

Becker saw the taller of the Japanese walk up to the old man and, without warning, slap the old Filipino to the ground.

"Nippon," he barked, "will still rule here next year to teach you again how to behave. As far right now . . ."

While the Japanese was screaming threats at the old man, other voices were heard. He ceased his tirade as the high-pitched voices came closer into the cave. Becker had hidden his shield of cartops. Becker could see six young girls dressed in peasant blouses and short blue cargo skirts, enter the cave. From the way the Japanese greeted them, it was obvious they had taken shelter in the cave during bombardment. Their shirts and blouses were all alike and Becker figured they must be school girls boarding close by.

"We'll have the whole damned town in here," Wilson growled under his breath to Becker.

Nervous and excited by the yell, the girls jolted in Tagalog. Then the big guns boomed out in a heavy anti-aircraft barrage. The drone of the bombers grew louder, drowning out all sounds but the roar of their engines.

"Shit!" Corinto muttered. "Japanese catch hell today." But no one heard him.

The first wave of planes passed overhead. Then the second salvo struck with such force that the earth shook under the impact. Hunks of dirt and stone fell from the arched roof of the cave. Then the bombs started to roar. A tremendous roar echoed through the cave as a bomb struck the side of the cliff directly above the entrance. The elderly Filipina, shrieking hysterically, ran to escape. As they reached the entrance, the cave let go in a mighty belch — limestone shattered and rolled with boulders and rubble to a crashing halt. A final scream plowed the air and the Filippines were gone — crushed beneath the avalanche.

A pause — no one dared move. And again the stone poured down the face of the mountain. Clouds of dust exploded inside the cave, dimming the lights. Something ran across Becker's hand as he searched the floor — a rat — a terrified rat was scurrying for safety. The Indonesians ceased.

"My God!" groaned Wilson. "We are buried alive!"

As soon as the earth settled, the two Japanese who had been sprawled on the ground, ran to what 10 minutes before had been the cave's entrance. They clawed and kicked at the rubble in a futile attempt to break their way out. They cursed and grunted as their fingers bled. It was useless.

"Listen," whispered Becker. "We are stuck in here. While we've got the chance, let's take these boys by surprise."

The two Japanese soldiers had left their rifles leaning against the stone wall. The grins, frizzled together, were whimsical and menacing. The Japanese were still digging away frantically. Becker drew his M-1 automatic.

"You guys grab the others," Becker ordered. "I'll take care of Toy's brother."

Stepping out of their hiding places behind the cartons, they quickly moved down toward the entrance. Wilson and Corinto picked up the rifles while Becker headed into the tunnel. The Japanese turned around slowly and stared at him in shocked surprise. Becker waved them back into the main supply room where the girls still huddled together, suddenly looking very happy.

"Is there another way out of this cave?" Becker asked. The taller of the two Japanese shook his head. He looked at the girls — they all needed aid. "Okay. Then let's fuck it. For us, the war's over." Becker turned to Wilson. "Break up the men."

"Do you think that's wise?" Wilson asked with a worried frown.

"We don't have much choice unless you want to shoot those men now."

Without a word, the Aussie elected the carbine. He picked up the gun bar and barged the barrels and firing mechanism, bending them beyond repair.

The taller Japanese, with a captain's insignia on his uniform, stared at them angrily and snarled. "You save your sideways."

Becker said it to Wilson. "Break it up, boy." Wilson hesitated and Becker added quickly, "Break it up. Until we get out of here, we'll live together by law, not by force."

Three sharp blows of the sword destroyed the revolver. The noise, gained confidence from the presence of Becker, Wilson and Corinto, started jolting. They seemed more relaxed, perhaps believing they'd be rescued.

Ortensio Fernandez, a tall, willowy girl with rich auburn hair, came up to Becker and shook his hand. "This was a decent thing, destroying the roads," she said. The other girls returned their approval.

The Japanese captain, named Doari, suddenly backed out an order. "You are my prisoners! You will take my orders!"

Becker threw back his head and laughed. "We're all prisoners. And no one gives orders."

Captain Doari narrowed his eyes, then turned his back on Becker and began talking to his countrymen.

The Japanese broke for the new beam, and there was no further hope made of who was whose prisoner.

But Cortine showed his face. "Bedeer — what are you going to do? How are you going to handle? We'll see."

Bedeer said shortly, "You'll frighten the others. There's enough air. Look there are many tunnels. Stop worrying."

On December 11, Bedeer opened his small notebook and made the first entry in his diary:

"Have started explorations of cave. Made my way through passageway of main chamber, walked 15 yards when walls started closing in on me. All seemed suddenly compressed. Felt much colder and damp — very damp. Corridor got darker. Blocked my path — just in time. Realized I was walking a deep chasm. Large drops of water dripped on my head. I touched my lantern cover up. Amazing. Tunnel seemed very delicate specimen; white, pink, lavender-tinted limestone (possibly) fluted columns, cornices, stalactites and terraces. Magical. Could go no farther, but decided to go back next with ropes and descend into the chasm.

"Explored other tunnels.

"Trotted on with crack team. At end of northeast tunnel, strong draft pulled us aside. Found tiny crevices in the rock, but these large enough for any hope of escape. However we are trapped.

"Generator in good shape and plentiful supply of petrol. Food no problem. Underground stream runs through one of large chambers. Two Japanese (one a sergeant and one a private). Our school girls sweet and still hopeful of rescue or escape. Wilson, Cortine and self have begun clearing away rubble at entrance. Japanese still insist we are their prisoners. We have made no effort to aid cave to Greater Asia Co.-Properties Sphere. Captain Ito is a cold, calculating character. Will have to be watched. Sergeant Tan-skin is built like proverbial cat-house and isn't too bright."

"Would you mind making that out to the church instead of to your God?"

On December 13, Bedeer went back to the chasm with Wilson. They had found some heavy rope and secured it with a spoke and loop, thereby devolving a rock-shaft piton. Bedeer, rope around his waist, lashed his way down the steep plastic pack. Wilson waited above on the slippery ledge, ready to pull Bedeer back up if anything went wrong. Wilson prayed for nothing to go wrong because he knew he could never get Bedeer back up again.

Down the shaft Bedeer went, carefully placing each foot in a niche, shoring signs at a steady pace. He couldn't linger for more than a second for fear of dislodging a stone. Stone fell loose as his feet grazed them — they had already been loosened from the force of water hitting them for years.

As he descended, he noticed small critters under some of the rocks. Mice, moths and small bugs bit into his flesh. He lowered his head back and forth trying to shake them off. They kept coming at him, but he continued moving down. At least there was no carbonic acid gas apparent. They had been afraid of that.

He was swimming bottom and could see the tiny blind fish swimming below him, and water rats darting about. The rats looked three times Bedeer had no time to think about them. He had to find a way out — if there was one.

(Continued on page 66)

"You been thinking, Bedeer. Sleep you spend most of your time in here answer . . ."

Dog doping is a cruel and nasty business. The animals are often drugged so much and so often by crooked owners that they develop into dope addicts, forever craving for another "hit". Then they become so smug they have to be destroyed and their bodies secretly buried. It seems a pity that these beautiful animals are so often the innocent prey of cruel and rapacious human criminals.

WILES

PROBABLY no sport in the world is as plagued by vicious racketeers as is greyhound racing in England. Periodically, gangs of doxies are rounded up, convicted and sentenced to terms of up to five years imprisonment — but there are always plenty more "lucky" dogs waiting to cash in on the crooked profits that can be made at the hundreds of bottom dog tracks that dot the country.

Every night of the week except Sunday, greyhounds are racing at different tracks around the United Kingdom. Sixty-five of the biggest dog tracks are members of the National Greyhound Racing Society, which employs 100 ex-police officers as members of its Security Service to protect坦bers from crooks. Unfortunately, there are at least another 100 independent tracks where there is no such supervision.

Even at the supervised tracks the greyhound racketeers do occasionally get away with their tricks. Thus a few years ago, a crooked coup was successfully perpetrated at London's White City, recognised as the most heavily guarded track in the world.

Hours before every meeting, the dogs are housed at White City under the care of men of the Security Service. The dogs for each race are kept in separate high-walled yards, each dog in its own steel-lined compartment or kennel.

Just before the race, they are taken from the yard to the starting boxes in a big van like a Black Maria. There is no apparent way anyone can get at the dogs after they reach White City.

One December night, the last race at White City had only five runners — Kildare Lad, Fly Beau, Victory Speech, Half Truth and Jimmy Clinton. All the dogs were safely placed in the starting boxes, and then there was a wild betting plunge on Half Truth, which dropped in price from 8/1 to 3/1 in a couple of moments.

The race started. The home few open, and the five dogs plunged out in a bunch. Seconds later, four of them seemed to falter. One stumbled, and the other three slowed to a confused, heavy-legged gallop faster than a trot.

Only one dog, Half Truth, was running normally, and he strode easily to the lead. At the winning post he was 15 lengths in front of his four bewildered and obviously drugged rivals.

Within seconds, tough-looking "smarmies" in fishy suits and pointed shoes rushed up to dozens of bookmakers, brandishing winning tickets and demanding payment.

Dogs are used which slow down a dog's heart beat and give it a fantastic turn of speed for a short time. When the race is over, it is often so exhausted that its handler has to half carry it back to its kennel. Conversely, chloroform, used in pentothal remedies, has long been a favorite with modern greyhound dogmen. It makes the animal feel as if a ton has been dropped on its head.

OF THE DOG DOPERS

Although they knew the other runners had been "set up," there was nothing the police could do, and they stood up. At the tall windowsized glass doors of the gang, with Sutton of Bald Truth tickled. Total estimated earnings were $100,000.

White City officials called in Steelband Yard, and Superintendent Fabian (now retired) investigated. A careful search of the steel-lined kennels where the five dogs had been housed revealed, in several of them, traces of fish impregnated with the drug chloroform.

Used in sea-fisherman reaches, chloroform has long been a favorite with modern crooked dogmen. Its particular value is that the dog which has swallowed it shows no sign until in the excitement and excitement of the race its blood pressure rises up. Then the drug relaxes, and the animal feels as if a ton weight has been dropped on its head.

There were nine kennels in the yard. Only one had been used. Fabian methodically examined the others. In three he found neither. The last kennel, however, had some timber piled beside it.

"That can't not be used," an attendant told the Superintendent. "I found it pulled up this afternoon when I came on duty. Apparently it's been used to stink that timber."

"Who pulled it up?" demanded Fabian.

Neither the attendant nor anyone else seemed to know. Fabian then tried the door, and to everyone's surprise it swung open on well oiled hinges.

Entering the kennel, Fabian found why the attendant thought the door had been nailed up. Someone had fitted metal bolts inside the door and locked himself in.

It was easy then to work out what had happened. Someone had entered White City via the outside wall sometime the previous night. He knew which yard would be used for dogs in the last race and had selected himself in one of the kennels — locking himself in and splicing pieces of timber he had brought with him to hide himself and make it appear the kennel was stocked full of dogs.

He had remained concealed in the kennel until the dogs had arrived and been placed in their compartments. Then, while the attendant was absent for a few minutes, he had snatched out and fed the drugged fish to all the dogs except Bald Truth. Back in the kennel, he had waited until the dogs were removed in the van and on their way to the start. Then it was an easy matter to slip out of the yard, meet his confederate and give him the signal that all was well and they could make the planned on Bald Truth.

Fabian knew how the ruse had been worked — but it was a different story naming the man responsible. He set detectives checking on all the well-known dog-dopers, and it did not take long to discover that a fellow well known to the police had suddenly acquired plenty of money and was busily spending it like an Arabian oil sheikh on a spree.

Every way Fabian knew was tried to get someone to talk, but to no avail. His men trailed the suspect 24 hours a day but could find nothing to pin on him. In desperation the Superintendent resorted to bluff.

He walked up to the crook as he sat in a hotel bar and said, "Hard luck. We know all about it."

A startled fellow looked up and blurted nervously, "Yes," went on Fabian, "It's a dead certainty that White City job." He looked the man in the eye and waited hopefully for him to make a slip.

Chloroform can be traced back to Biblical times, when they were used as husters. It seems a pity that these beautiful animals, which many claim are the cleverest paroled dogs in the world, are so often the innocent prey of human criminals.

Wiles Of The Dog Dopers cont.

It was no good. He had recovered his poise and a smile spread over his face. "Have a drink, Mr. Fenton," he invited. "You know you've got nothing on me."

The Superintendent arched and had the drink. He kept trying, but no time went on before the suspect was right — he had nothing on him. Officially the Bold Train doper over remains unconvicted to this day.

Not all the dog dopers get away with it. In 1933 three men were found guilty at the Old Bailey and each sent to jail for 18 months for conspiring to cheat people betting on dogs. One of the three men was a brilliant Harley Street specialist and another was a wealthy jeweler who owned several unregistered dog tracks.

Unfortunately for them, two Scotland Yard detectives happened to overhear them talking in the bar of London's Cook Tavern and put two and two together when they heard words like greyhound, White City, male hormones, cortisone, insulin, blood pressure and sugar in the blood.

A search was put on the three men. The doctor, who was obviously responsible for the drugs, sent a registered parcel to one of the other men. The next day, after the postman had delivered the parcel at the flat of the address, detectives staged a raid. Spread out on a table was the opened parcel — containing a hypodermic syringe and quantities of various drugs including hexamethonium bromide.

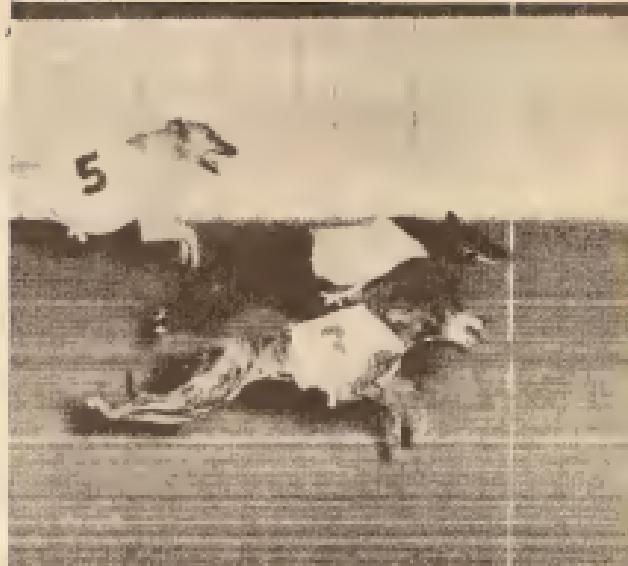

In court the whole plot was revealed, half a dozen unknown but pretentious prostitutes had been brought in Ireland by the third conspirator. In England they were to be entered in a number of unimportant races and run while doped with the traceless hexamethonium bromide.

This had the effect of lowering their blood pressure, and the sugar content of the blood would go down — resulting in poor runs and bad times. The dogs would continue to be low graded by handicappers and entered in races with odds of something like 100-1.

Naturally there would finally come a day for each dog when the three men would gamble heavily on it — and on that day it would run unshod, as it were. All was set for a big clean-up. When the police swooped following the ill-advised conversation in the Cook Tavern that was audible to the two detectives,

The jury took only 45 minutes to find the trio guilty, and for the doctor the punishment of 18 months imprisonment was only a minor matter compared with the subsequent action by the BSA to remove his name from the medical register.

Another greyhound racketeer who came to grief a few years ago turned his way into a butcher's yard late at night and stole a well-perfumed dog from its kennel. He kept it out of the way for about three months until the furors had died down and then dyed it black, leaving a diamond-shaped patch around one of its eyes. The dog was taken to an unmanaged track in the Midlands and entered in a race for novice dogs as "The White-eyed Kaffir," after a famous comedian of the stage-hall days.

Course Rackets Knocked out some officials, particularly in the country, who were not concerned for straight dealing. A few years back a race Judge bluntly signalled a dead-beat when his dog ran beaten into second place . . .

To make sure there was no slip-up, the dog was fed a pep drug although it would have been good enough to beat its opponents on three legs. In the betting at 10/1 and turned to 7/4 as the crook and his associates doffed hats to it.

But in his excitement for a big clean-up the mastermind of the scheme had made a bad blunder by dropping the dog. It walked in by such a big margin that suspicion was immediately aroused following the tremendous betting狂热. Bookmakers on the course held a hurried conference and announced they would pay no winning bets until there was an inquiry into the bona fides of "The White-Eyed Kaffir."

Meanwhile the bound boy had taken the dog for the customary spins down — and in the process his bonds turned black. The game fled, leaving their heavy Shakespeare in the bookmakers' bags. Within a few hours, the "brink" of the fence and one of his sides had been arrested, and they were subsequently jailed for 18 months apiece.

The number of times the plots of the disgruntled dopers blow up in their faces and end in disaster, it seems a wonder so many of them keep in the business. The answer must be that we only hear of the rackets that are detected. Many more of the crooks must quietly run with it, and no one is ever that.

A scheme that did not succeed took place at a dog track in the North of England in 1951. It was the brainchild of a gang of dopers who thought sheer bad luck were all they'd needed and jacked. They doctored three greyhounds. In a certain race with dope to make them run slow. There was a rank outsider in the field which no one thought had a shot as they left it alone. That left two other dogs, and on them they wagered heavily on the tote, convinced they could not lose.

When the starting boxes opened to everyone's astonishment all six dogs in the field staggered out like a bunch of drunks. Loser around, the perplexed congo-ratulations recognized another year in the crowd. They had doctored the other two dogs and the outsider. As a result, no dog finished the course. The tote was declared off, and detectives were quick off the mark to round up both gangs.

Dog doping is a cruel and nasty business. The animals are often drugged so much and so often by crooked owners that thus develop into dogs addled, forever craving for another "shot". Then they become so weak they have to be destroyed and their bodies secretly buried.

Drugs are used which slow down a dog's heart beat and give it a fantastic surge of speed for a short time. But when the race is over, it is often so exhausted that the handler has to half carry it back to its kennel.

The drugs eventually begin to get a grip on the animal. It loses its appetite and then its form and can run no faster no matter how much dope it is fed.

It's a vicious circle. The more dope the crooks give the dog the more it wants. Its muscles start to twitch. It's eyes rot bloodshot — both warning signs that it is rapidly approaching a stage of savagery when it can kill a man. If the dog is deprived of the drug when in that state it creeps to type becomes a wolf ready to attack any living thing that comes near it.

In 1966 a greyhound trainer in Manchester, England, was attacked by a dog he had been doping. He was knocked sprawling on his back and his face ripped open. Only a tough boy managed to kick the maddened dog off, the trainer would have been killed. As it was, his face required 30 stitches, and his own mother would now hardly recognize him.

It is at the independent greyhound tracks in the United Kingdom where the dogs recklessly flourish. Supervision is lax, and often it is possible for a crook to arrive with his dog a bare five minutes before the race starts. Naturally that gives them the chance to inject water-soluble liquid drugs directly into the bloodstream. With a dramatic effect on the animal's heart and performance.

Last year a veteran dog "connoisseur" in a London paper here he had used the last minute doping method at a Scottish track. He had already given his dog a shot of cortisone to pep it up, then learned another very good performer was also entered for the race.

Clearly something called the nec-crosis of the dog's dog was to win, and accordingly he gave him an injection just before he was taken to the start. "He was so pegged up when he got to the home," he told the newspaper, "that he was running circles out of the bend with his paws in his ears. Luckily for me nobody noticed it."

"At the start he broke from the trap the split second it was opened, and he won by half a length. Of course he wasn't worth a damn by the time I got him back to my hotel. He could hardly walk from exhaustion, and the vets say such an injection permanently damages the heart.

"It's a hard game all right — but you've got to be hard if you're going to stay ahead in it. There are so many doped dogs at the unregistered tracks that if you're not doped too, you'd probably never win a race unless you had a champion."

One of England's worst crooked racetracks was a character known as "The Ringer". His nickname came from his specialty of "ringer to", a good dog at some no-hoper and so making him a certainty to win a stacked race. He made an estimated £10,000 a year for 34 years out of greyhounds and then switched to horses for a final £300,000 clean-up.

He consequently substituted a good performer for a mediocre French horse in the $250 Selling Plate at Bath Races one day in July, 1969. The photofit duly won at 10/1, and it was this found that it had been backed with scores of off-the-course bookies from southern England to the north of Scotland.

All would have been well for The Ringer and his associates had not an elderly catch-cleaner gone to the police with a story that he had seen two men in a truck cut several telephone cables into the Bath race-track that day. This had been done so the bookies could not telephone the bets back to the course and so reduce the dogs' starting price.

However the catch-cleaner's story started a Scotland Yard investigation as a result of which the whole gang was rounded up. Four men were sent to jail with sentences ranging from nine months to three years for The Ringer himself.

England's biggest doping ring in the history of greyhounds was arrested in December, 1968. Ten conspirators — including seven girls who had been worked as prostitutes — were sent to prison for terms up to three years. The leader had been engaged in the racket for 14 years without a mishap, and he probably could have continued indefinitely but for one girl who refused to go through with a doping because she loved dogs.

The girl was working as a kennel maid at Barbury, MidDevon, when one morning she said nervously to her kennel manager. She narrated not a story that she had been paid £75 by two men she met in a London hotel to give dope to three of the greyhounds under her care by means of pellets in meatballs.

Police were called in and the widespread racket disclosed. Other bookmakers all over England were investigated and a number of them were found to be working in league with the gamblers.

At the trial after the crooks were rounded up, it was estimated that the leader of the gang had made about £110,000 from doping in the previous five years. He had stopped detection for so long because he bought his drugs abroad. Apart from stimulants and laxatives, he had also discovered a liquid made in France which paralyses an animal's muscles. He would simply smear it on his hand, then pat the back of the dog he wanted to slow up.

The gang leader in this case

England is the home of the vicious racers who plague greyhound racing. Australian crooks were not as cruel as their English cousins. One of the most popular old-time Aussie tricks to prevent a dog whining was to stick a nail of chewing gum between the pads of its foot. Kingsmen were successfully prosecuted in NSW as recently as 1969 — officials claim that doping is now impossible at Australian dog tracks.

"You should appreciate this, doctor. It seems I left my wrench in your engine."

made a statement to the English Press that in 1934 he went to Australia and cleaned up £14,000 in one race at Sydney's Harold Park greyhound track. He claimed that he subsequently disposed of all the dogs except two in a selected race with拈阄 (抽签), practically parting them to sleep. Then he backed the other two (which were then estimated to run first and second) on the outside and in due course collected the cash.

Sydney officials denied the possibility of such a coup and said the Kookaburra had arrived the day before to tell his story to an English paper. They were probably right, for such a doping scheme is generally admitted to have been impossible at an Australian dog track as late as 1935. For all that, there was a time some years ago when the Australian greyhound sport was notorious as a crooked paradise.

In those bad old days, skidgerry at local tracks was to believe that only the most starry-eyed of the gambling public would risk a bet on the "dogs". Hot favorites lost with monotonous regularity — often because they were fed before their races with finely ground mineral crystals hidden in a blob of whipped cream or some such doddery.

The effect was to snap their wind. They jumped out of their boxes like champions, but after 50 yards could be depended on to their crooked connections to slow to a mere trot. Stevens, until then unable to the track, decided the dogs had pulled a muscle or broken down and took no action. No other officials were suffered and a week or so later, at a much more attractive price for those in the know, the dog world showed off its old form and bolted.

Other tricks Australian gamblers used thought up to prevent a dog winning until it was wanted were to stick a wad of chewing gum between the pads of its foot, or slip a rubber band around a couple of toes. Such bandages probably stayed there only a short distance, but that was probably enough to ruin any chance the discredited animal had. For a while the pro-hound "shrewdies" waited to stop a dog implicated extra weight in the muzzle — until one dog made such a face at the start officials investigated and discovered the racket.

A certain Sydney greyhound bookmaker made a specialty of laying at very attractive prices dogs he knew were "crook" and had no chance. Only once did his plans come unstuck. He approached the owner of a near-champion dog regarded as having a mortisite on the last race at Harold Park the Saturday night. For a consideration the owner saw the wisdom of losing.

All the Saturday afternoon the owner was busy with his greyhound. He took it swimming for hours, had a launch run at it for miles behind his car and then filled it up with an lavish food and drink as it could consume. The result was that at six o'clock, when taken to the track, the animal's only interest was in sleeping. The书makers forgot, however, that the race was more than four hours later. In that time the dog recovered all its vigor. It bounded out of the start and was never headed, breaking the course record for the distance.

Not all Australian greyhound officials either, particularly in the country, were renounced for straight dealing. At a certain meeting a few years back, several spectators at the finishing line were amazed by the stern-faced shouts of encouragement given to one of the runners by a kookaburra-jangled individual. It turned out to be a race judge. His class, however, was not good enough and failed by at least a neck to overtake the leader. The quick-thinking judge blandly announced a dead-heat.

As recently as 1949, ring-ins were successfully perpetrated in New South Wales. That year three men went to jail for their part in organizing a 100-class performer for a Greyhound meet at a country racetrack. Police estimated $3000 was obtained with that single track.

Munific preparations were necessary. A pup was registered. Its papers so altered that they fitted another dog's description.

This dog was entered for a minor race and unusually backed down to 1/1 on. He came home like a rocket, winning by 16 lengths.

However officials snuff a rat

They examined the dog, but, as he conformed to his papers and gave no signs of being drugged, they gave the all-clear that both were to be paid. Nevertheless they were still not satisfied and ordered the dog suspended for further investigation.

CIBS detectives were called in, and they soon Uncovered the plot. The ringleaders were arrested and charges made which carried them prison sentences of two years a piece.

Several greyhound ring-in gangs have operated in the NSW North Coast district. Some years ago, one of them engaged a skilled woman beauty specialist to help disguise a champion dog to look like something else. All went well until the dye she put on the dog's coat began to wear off and was spotted by an alert official.

On another occasion, a well-known Sydney champion was kidnapped. He was taken by air to a country truck and run-in for another dog. To make absolutely certain of winning the crooks literally doused the dog with a dangerous drug. He won and they drove off in a festive. Police later traced the dog to Queensland and recovered him. The drug however, had taken heavy toll, and it was a physical wreck when returned to its heart-broken owner.

These days, fortunately, are over in Australia. However, gangs are still flourishing in Great Britain. Periodically gangs of dopers are rounded up, arrested and sentenced in terms of up to five years imprisonment — yet there are still plenty of shady characters waiting to cash in on the crooked profits that can be made at the hundreds of dog tracks that dot the country.

"Well don't think of them as bairns, think of them as room dividers."

Greyhounds can be traced back to Biblical times, when they were used as hunters. It seems a pity that these beautiful animals, which many claim are the oldest purebred dogs in the world, are so often the innocent prey of cruel and rapacious human criminals.

APPOINTMENT IN TANGIER

Drugs weren't my business — but I needed the money! And when this beautiful Brigitte Bardot-Anita Ekberg doll made the signs and a promise, I was lead like a bull to the slaughter . . .

IT'S tough arriving in Italy with only the price of a bottle of wine between you and starvation. But it would be tougher to be on the other side of the border, after the last moment-of-jest job, all the rest were probably sitting in some Sicilian office sweating it out with the same disease. And they could be tough. If that tourist couple hadn't fallen for my story and bid me, I wouldn't even have made it — or have the price of some wine.

I found a place and ordered my bottle. The waiter, by some such sense, knew it was all I had, and showed no interest in me, just lowered the drunk down and went away. I took my time drinking it, savoring it had nowhere to go, and by the time I was half way through it the management was beginning to tremble. Perhaps I was a bad advertisement for the place in my dirty clothes. The management approached to show me out, but suddenly looked over my shoulder and gave up.

Saved by another customer, I thought.

The new comer sat down beside me and looked at me shrewdly. He was gruff and dagger, and had an upsetting way of looking.

"Hi," I said, after a few minutes. "Piss English?"

"Yes, Squire, and I speak it grammatically. Shall we eat the language?" I let that ride, and he continued. "Mr. Regan, isn't? Dark Regan?"

I nodded. I had nothing to lose.

"I thought you were in France, Mr. Regan. Your photograph was in the French papers yesterday." He looked at his polished finger nails. "I make it my business to read a selection of foreign papers. The information is useful sometimes."

I said nothing. The dagger hand began studying raised itself an inch and a waiter appeared at his elbow. He rattled out some rapid Italian and, turning to me, the waiter said, "Drink your wine, I have ordered more. We have a lot to talk about. May I ask you your future please?" "I'd like to get out of the country," I said.

"Nowhere south or east, I expect," he said. "It is difficult without money or passport however, and there are some other complications in your case. Tell me, can you use an umbrella?"

"I've used them before."

"Then I may be able to help you. Shall we depart and discuss business in more confidential surroundings? My car is outside."

"Let's wait for the fresh bottle."

"Pah, I have better wine than that, and more than you could drink in six years," he said. "Leave it and come!" He threw down a banknote, and I followed him out.

If you're a middleclass Italian, you can afford to run a Vespa or a Fiat; a rich one can afford an Alfa Romeo or a Lancia; he can a Fiat Vespa, imported from France and worth a fortune. They've appeared to tow smoothly from 10 to 150 miles an hour in top. This one, once we reached the autostrada, touched 100 in 4 seconds. Without straining and purring happily along at three figures. And when we reached his "more congenial surroundings," they matched the car.

The palissade he lived in stood on a cliff overlooking the sea, and he needed enough land to make it invisible from the road. As we pulled up, the main doors opened, and a servant with a face like a rock-carving came out. Immediately we got out of the car he took it over, I looked after him questioningly.

"My valet, Amadeo," he said. "A Sicilian, and a dead-smile. The Garibaldieri caught him, and I was lucky to rescue him. By the time my authorities found him, he could no longer talk or hear, or for that matter, pronounce. He is very bitter, of course, but completely faithful to me."

"I can understand that. That reminds me, I don't know your name."

"You can call me Morticelli. It means, of course, little fish, but it was good enough for the old master and will do for me. Now, would you be kind enough to sit down? We had arrived in a medium sized room lined with books and oil paintings. From the unimpressive look of them, they were old and valuable. I took the chair he pointed at, and Amadeo appeared with a bottle, a cigar, some ice, and a bridge under his left arm which hadn't been there before. A well-made brazier, I thought, as he put the things down and stood behind my chair.

"I imagine whisky will be more to your taste, Mr. Regan," Bettacchi said. "Now, shall we commence? Amadeo can read Italian, so you may speak English. We are alone apart from him."

"You're making the proposition," I said.

"Ah yes, very observant of you. Well, Mr. Regan, I have heard you will do anything for money. Further, I would point out that in your present condition, you have little choice about what you do. If you accept my — ah — proposition, you will get a certain amount of cash, and be landed at my country convenient to yourself, if you do not accept, you will not leave here alive."

"You make it difficult to refuse."

"Of course. You will understand that I make my living from smuggling. There are a large number of smugglers in this country. I am one of the most successful. I have a rival who is threatening to usurp my position. He is in fact, using my territories for his business. He drops his prices about 20 miles out that way." He pointed out the window at the sea.

"Just drop it in the sea! How does he pick it up?"

"Studer is the biggest difficulty in picking it up. He has solved this by standing his boat off about two miles, and having a diver do a one-man submarine pick it up. In this way, and with a deserved time lag between dropping and picking it up, he avoids all suspicion."

"So you want me to jump it in the time lag? How deep? How much time lag?"

"About 120 ft. He usually waits about two hours before sending a boat to pick it up. It requires another 20 minutes for the submarine to reach the spot. His boat goes as an underwater research vessel."

"How do we find the boat? At 120 ft it can fall in a lot of places."

"Fortunately, our Italian waters are clear, and the casting will be painted a bright yellow. Moreover, it contains a device which emits regular pulses, which are discernible underwater for some distance. You will be taken out in my boat as soon as it is dropped, and will be wearing an oversize dry diving suit. When you have located the cabin, you will strap it to your self. This will be necessary, it will be too large to hold. Inflate your raft with air, and rise gently to the surface to be picked up."

"It's so big, how come nobody sees it go overboard? And what happens if the customs boys get us?"

"You are very impulsive. The compass is placed on the hull of the ship like a lamp shade, and automatically releases when an agent sends a signal of the correct time through the ship's hull by means of a portable signal generator. In answer to your second question, my boat can store its stores to any customs officer. As you will have noticed, I appreciate fast ships. In case you meet a rival diver, we have imported an American device—an underwater CO₂ pistol, capable of killing at 25 feet. Satisfied?"

"One more question. Seeing you know all this, why don't you just set rid of him by informing?"

"I shall, when I can no longer profit from him. Now if you are available, we have a week before us. You should spend it practicing. I suggest you limit your intake of alcohol in the meantime. You will live here of course. Everything you want will be provided, and a payment at the end of, say, 1200."

"A thousand. And how about some surprises?"

"You are in no position to bargain, Mr. Hogan. And you will have all the surprises you can afford after you finished. It is too dangerous before that."

"All right, Mr. And —"

"Va!" Botticelli shouted, looking over my shoulder, and added again more Italian, too rapid for me to understand. I looked at the doorway and caught a glimpse of something that made Bridgitte Bardot look sickly and Anita Ekberg uninteresting all at the same time, before Botticelli screamed "Va!", again, and she went.

"Ah," I said, "I thought you said no surprises. I'll take the job."

"You would have taken it anyway," he said smoothly. "You will not see her again. And now, another drink?"

So we had another drink.

A week later I was fitter than I ever had been since I stopped playing football at college. I'd been diving every day and dives spearfishing with lungs are buried in Italy and we didn't want to take chances, I'd been practising with a sword and casting enough fish to feed us.

Annie and I climbed into Botticelli's speedboat, checked our gear, and cast off. The three-bottle lung was full to capacity; the CX22 pistol was fully charged, some bullet and a silenced 12mm rifle were there for company. The twin motors made the boat plane faster than I'd ever been on water. In half an hour we had reached the dumping spot, and I was over the side.

The water closed over my head, and I sank slowly, feet first, into the depths. I slipped over 10 feet from the bottom, and started swimming upwards in a spiral. In five minutes I had the signal rod and clear, and in another 10 I had the carbon strapped on and was preparing to release my suit. Suddenly I felt a shattering impact on my left shoulder and a searing pain. I looked at it, and saw the barb of a spear opening as it was pulled back through it.

Climbing I pushed backwards and around, and pulled out my pistol. Ten feet above me, another diver had the spear card and was reeling me in like a fish. I took careful aim and shot him through the solar plexus. His suit hit mouthpiece out and bubbled bloody as he sank.

I unscrewed the spear head and pulled it out. It was lucky he hadn't hit me a few inches to the right. I grabbed him and lifted my suit, and we floated away from his torpedo. We could still hear with bodies, he'd never come up and nobody would ever know the difference.

As I broke water with my exosuit in front of me I saw Annie squatting down the aisle of the train. Instantaneously I heard the soft pop of the rifle, and felt and heard the thud as the bullet took my burden in the head. I had surrendered and sheltered behind her so they were going to kill me and take the load, were they?

Annie started the engine and hauled the boat up on its stabilisation system written all over his grubby face. Suddenly the propeller of the boat splashed two feet from the driver's seat. The sound of the shot followed a few seconds later. The rails were on to us. My confused mind screamed, but a fair way off, thank God still, things were getting much too hot. As Annie turned sharply I sent a few fast, sharp little jabs into my companion's suit, turned him upside down, and sent him slowly bubbling toward the bottom. His air stream should confuse the shot a bit, I thought, and I sucked in my suit and headed for the bottom.

His torpedo was still there, with two spare lungs on board. The electric motor started steadily, and conserving my breath as well as possible, I scuttled along the bottom.

An hour later the torpedo's batteries were flat, and I was out of air and faint from loss of blood. My suit was full of water, so I

"You told me you'd be marking tonight. You know, David, this is the second time I've caught you lying this month!"

swam laboriously upwards, resting every few feet as the air supply came on again. At last I broke the surface and looked round. There was nobody in sight. I had dropped my weight belt when I started to come up, and now I flopped over onto the empty bottle and relaxed. The sun was warm and I was shot. I think I passed out.

The next thing I knew a boat hook dug into my damaged shoulder and the pain shooting me awake. I was dragged over to the side of a boat, my legs were cut off me, and I not aboard with some help after the computer had been strapped to the right. I looked at my rescuer.

"Well," I said, "the British Human-Anti-Atlas Editors don't like to see you."

"The name," she said, "is Rossana, and it is also nice to see you, Mr. Hogan."

"Call me Dick," I said, all grinning. "Where is our mutual friend Betticelli?"

"He is not my friend, nor yours, I suspect. He left in a hurry when Amadeo returned without you. I decided to see if I could find you, so I borrowed the outboard motor boat. Allowance a decent interval for the other craft to depart," she added as an afterthought.

"What caused them to desertify? Damn, I thought. I'm beginning to talk like them now."

"Betticelli informed the customs before he left," she said simply. "They had words together."

"And were you looking for me or the computer?"

"Well, I find you very attractive, and a fortune in drams is not to be disregarded."

"If one has the market," I said.

"You can arrange that when you are well," she said. "In the meantime, the coast above here is very rocky, and at a sufficient distance from the palace, I know of a cave where you can be safe and warm while you heal."

"With you, Rossana, I'm sure I'll heal much more rapidly," I said, and passed out again.

I slept most of the first three days in my cave, while Rossana took the boat closer to civilization each day and walked in to get provisions. With the food took the cave, and a good morning or goodnight kiss every time I woke up or went to sleep, I healed rapidly, and soon began to take notice. Rossana was sleeping in the cave, and she wasn't modest about it. She was built in a way to make osteopathics envious, as well. On the third night I felt fairly right, and when the time came to kiss me goodnight I grabbed her and pulled her down. She lay on me and laughed as I kissed her. Then, as my hands slid down her back, she pushed me gently away. I wasn't as stroked as I thought.

"You see," she said. "You are still weak. Wait until later."

I waited then until the fifth night and captured her again. This time she couldn't get away.

"Well," I said, "Am I strong enough now?" As I said my hand rolled from my back she relaxed for a moment and then wriggled away.

"My name's Phillip Parker. Will you marry me?"

as I loosened my other arm.

"Yes," she said, pausing slightly. "You are certainly strong enough now, and so you will have business tomorrow, and must save your strength for it. When you are that condition, I will be yours."

"Who can I tell it to? I don't know anybody."

"Why not Betticelli and have your revenge too?" she asked innocently. "I have managed to obtain a small pistol."

"Yeah, why not?" I thought about it for a while, and began to like the idea. "But we've got all to think. How about a little adventure?"

"You will need all your strength tomorrow, certainly," she said. "Wait a little." And she made a very intimate gesture and went to her rug.

The next morning we dumped the computer in about 10 feet of water under a ledge, and I took the boat along the coast toward the palace. It wasn't likely to be there, as it was only rented for the job, but it was a good place to start.

I crept into the landing as close to the rocks as I could get with the motor shut off. The steps were out of sight of the palace, so I went up them poised and fast. Then a quick crocodile ran round the house and ate the man down, and also the Pascal Vara. I was in luck. It had its dinner optic and was obviously being packed, so I took the keys out and stepped into the shadow behind a column for the palace door.

It wasn't long before Amadeo came out laden down with suitcases. He walked right into my roundabout event. The boy passed all his might between the eyes.

I kicked him aside and slipped into the hall, and then the library. Betticelli was there, picking books off the shelves. I parlayedled up behind him, reached round and grabbed a handful of his chest hair, spun him round and tossed him into a chair, giving the fat an extra twist as I did it. He sat there looking green and holding his stomach.

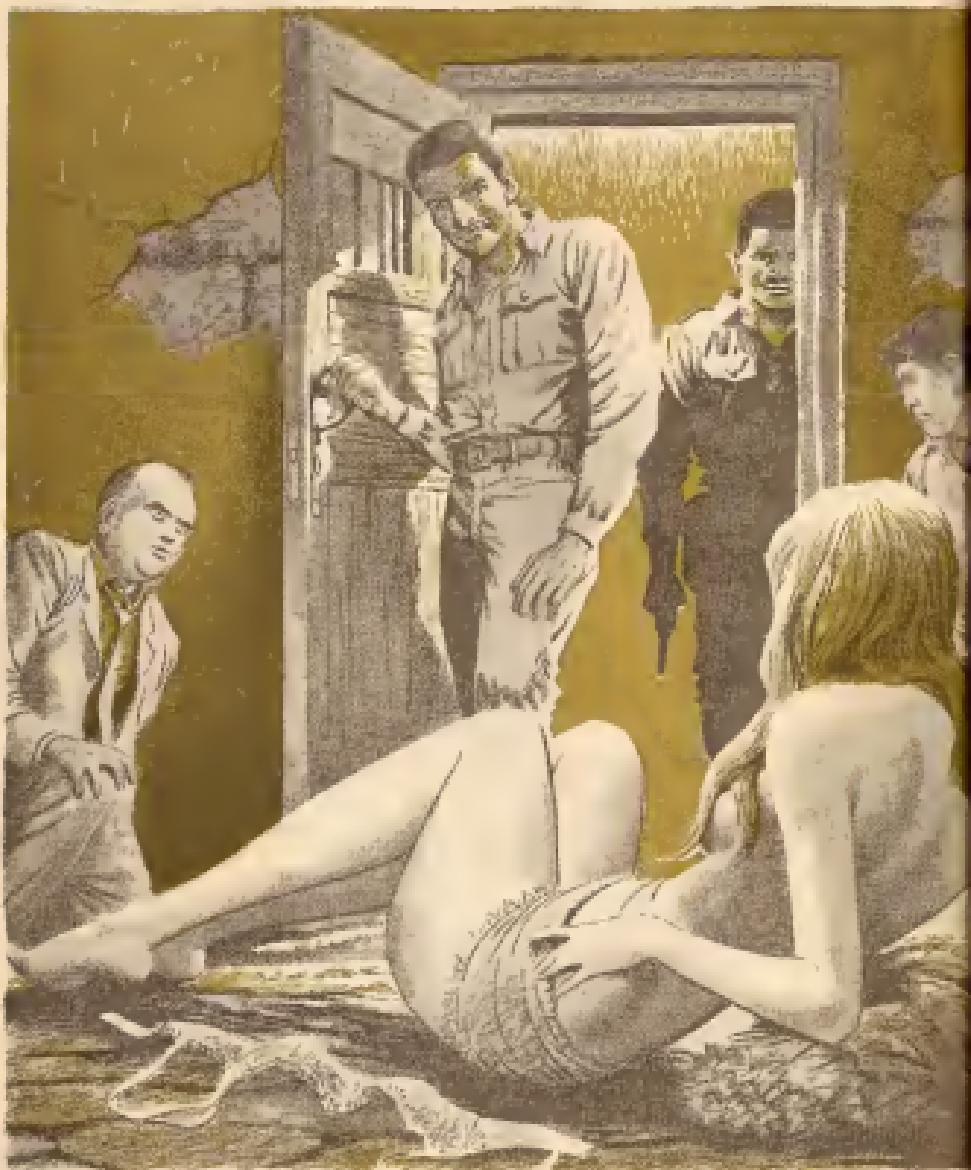

"Long time since I saw you, Betticelli," I said. "How's things?"

(Continued on page 50)

FACT

GEORGE LA BREQUE

ONE HOT

NIGHT IN ORAN

This interview was taken by Martin Sevest, French newspaperman of Marseilles, on behalf of this writer. The notes were signed by H. Le Breque and submitted to the French military authorities in Oran for official clearance and, if desired, any amendments they might wish to make for security reasons. No amendments were made. The facts were cleared for publication, but publication in Algeria was forbidden. The authorities were asked for a comment and stated that there was nothing to report and "nothing very unusual about the case except that Mme. Finch and M. Le Breque escaped with their lives". Incidents of white people being kidnapped and murdered while held as hostages, the authorities said, "are all too common in Algeria" but are largely suppressed in the cause of security.

I COULD not decide whether I was blind or whether the place in which I regulation consciousness was so dark that I could see nothing. A pneumatic drill hammered at my head until I thought my brain would explode. I tried to lift my hand to my forehead and a sharp-edged rebarlike thing bit into my flesh.

I heard someone groaning in the dark and called out. "Hello, hello. Who are you? Where are we?" My voice was hoarse, my throat dry and painful. No one replied, but the groans continued.

I tried to move my legs and found that they were just as firmly lashed together at the ankles as my wrists were lashed together behind my back. I was trussed up like a chicken for the pot, lying half on my side, my body protesting at every movement I made in sheer blind agony.

My brain began to clear slowly in a painful process as I tried to recall the events of the night, but there was little to recall except that I knew I had been taken for a ride by the girl I had met in the Cafe d'Oran on the Rue de la République in Oran. I lay about in the intense darkness. "I am going to get even with that bitch!" but not or when I could not figure.

All I remember very clearly was meeting the girl in the cafe—one of those joints where you drink beer and dance and buy tickets and select your girl to dance or sit out with you, and told me her name was Virginie and that she had originally come from Marseilles to work in Oran as a restaurant hostess. Now that I looked back on the matter I did not believe anything of what she said. I figured that I should have known she was a rebel spy.

She wasn't much more than 22 or 23, a blonde with almost coal-black eyes and full Simmons lips. I bought up the rest of her time and we sat drinking French wine at it a bottle until after midnight when I asked her if I could go along to her apartment.

"It will cost you 100," she said. She asked to be caressed and went off in the direction of the women's powder-room and returned after about 15 minutes, smiling. She had a light imitation make-up around her sun-tanned shoulders and low-cut V-necked evening gown revealing full sun-tanned bosom that made my blood quiver. In my wine, I was on vacation for 10 days in Oran from my job in Tangier. Taking leave to Marseilles or if you like a bourgeois holiday, but I did not want to go back to France for my vacation owing to a long outstanding little matter I had to settle with the police in Marseilles, a little matter involving a fight I had with a gendarme which I won.

"I live quite nearby," Virginie said as we stepped onto the sidewalk on this hot April night. Some Americans and Arab sailors were tooting picture postcards of nude women and tickets for a Maltese receptionist on the sidewalk. I brushed them aside with a curse and pushed on with the girl on my arm.

We came to an alleyway, dark and dismal the most streets and alleys in Oran. A couple of legionnaires of the French Foreign Legion stood talking on the corner, one whistled at the girl but I was wise enough to ignore it. Two gendarmes armed with pistols and a soldier carrying a light, quick-firing rifle came by as we walked down the alley. I never felt safer in my life even though Oran settled with unrest and the previous night two bomb outrages in the city had killed five Arabs and two Frenchmen and a French child.

Near the bottom of the alley, just before it joined up with the Rue Bretagne, the girl stopped and inserted a high key in a door, pushed the door open and invited me in. She walked ahead along a dark passage and mounted a staircase much like the stairway of some tenement in any city's poorer quarter.

Her room was quite well furnished with a single well-sprung bed and pretty green coverlet. There was hot and cold running water, a washbowl and dressing table, and a window overlooking the Rue Bretagne. I left at ease and saw as Virginie turned the key in the lock, dropped her wrap and turned to me. In a moment I had enfolded her in my arms and let her small sharp teeth biting passionately into my skin, then she pushed me away. "Let me have a drink," she said, and moved to a cabinet from which she took a bottle of cognac.

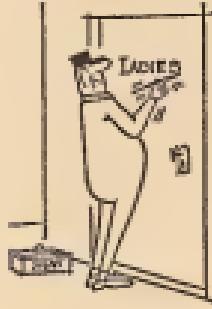

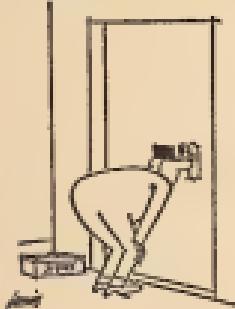

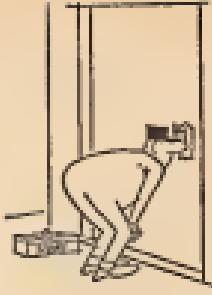

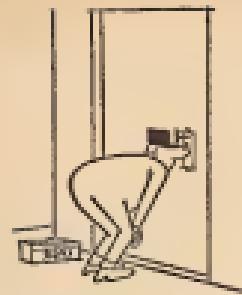

I watched her sinuous movements with mounting passion as she poured two generous helpings of cognac into two sparkling silver glasses. "You drink, sheila, while I go and change into something more comfortable."

I picked up the half-stunned glass and said, "To you!" She smiled again, a coy half-inviting smile and moved to the wardrobe while I sat down on the only chair, a deep arm-chair, sipping at the cognac as I watched her undressing slowly, deliberately, like a woman who knew how to undress.

Exactly when the drink hit me between the eyes I don't know. I must have drunk about three-quarters of the two or three liquid cansons before I fell the room spinning round me. I tried to take a grip on myself. I felt the glass slip from my fingers and fall to the floor. I vaguely remembered saying to myself, "I'll get myself cleaned out of this. I've only got about $13 on me, I never carry much money."

Then my world blacked out and when I started regaining my senses I felt the blackness around me, so thick you could put your hand out and touch it. One moment I rose on the crest of a wave and then I plummeted back into a bottomless pit as black as hell itself.

I had no recollection of how I got to be where I was or what had happened. I must have passed clean out from the doped drink. But why did the girl not follow the usual routine of Oran, rob me and have her bodyguard, or worse, remove me to be found drunk and robbed in some part?

"She was a damn fool," I said aloud, uncharitably. "She took me to her room. I could and will take the police there after I have paid her a personal visit."

"Monsieur," I heard a woman's voice, "Monsieur, pouvez-vous me donner quelques chose contre la douleur ?" She slipped into hysterical weeping.

I said, "What is it, Madame? How much pain have you? Can you come to me?"

The woman said in the jet black darkness, "I cannot come. I am tied up. I am in great pain. You can help me, right?"

I said, "I am sorry, Madame, but I, too, am tied up. Where are we and why are we here?" I heard a loud groan from nearby.

"We are prisoners of the rebels," the woman said through her tears. "I think they mean to kill us."

My eyes were slowly becoming accustomed to the darkness. I could make out some forms on the floor that looked human in shape. I struggled to sit up although waves of pain shot through my left arm and whole body with each movement. I wriggled my wrists a little but there was no flexibility in the bones. I did not know then, but found out soon, that whatever things made from animal skin were used to tie our wrists and ankles so that if we struggled they would tighten instead of easing off.

I called out, "Madame, if I move over to you could you try to loosen my wrists?"

The woman said, "I will try, Monsieur."

20 ADAM, June, 1981

roundings before the door (immediately to my left) opened outwards and two men I recognized at once as Algerians entered.

A tall man of 40 or so moved over and stood above me. He was bearded and dressed in a dirty black-coloured uniform and wore a Sam Browne belt and revolver in holster. He said in accented French, "You are a French national?"

"I am French," I replied. "What do you want with me?"

"What is your name?" he continued, ignoring my question and from his pocket took a notebook and pencil.

I told him my name. He wanted to know where my home was and I told him. Then he moved to the women. I saw that she was maybe 25 years of age, a blonde who would have been very good looking except for the dirt and partly dried blood on her face. She told him that her name was Danielle Pith. She was a French national from Perpignan in the district of Roussillon near the Spanish border and had been working at an assistant in an Oran jewellery store until kidnapped.

I noted that a man who lay near me was dressed in civilian clothes, but that another, still apparently unconscious, was dressed in the uniform of a private in the French Legion. The Algerian looked the man nearest me, the man in civilian clothes. He was the one who had been strangled so loosely and as the man struggled to sit up, the Algerian demanded to know his name. The man told the Algerian that his name was Albert Quirke, a businessman from Marseilles on a business trip to Oran.

The Algerian finished making notes, then moved to the door and

I had just started wriggling my way on my backside toward the woman when a sharp stab of light flashed on. For a few seconds I was completely blinded by the brilliance of the incandescent bulb buried in the ceiling. I had another three or four seconds to take in my sur-

"Well, we've discussed politics, the weather, the news . . . now let's sit out of the room one at a time and we'll talk about each other."

stood looking down at me.

"I am sorry," he said slowly but without a sign of regret in his voice, "that it has to be you. But you were the unlucky ones. We merely wished to make sure that you are French nationals. That man," he indicated the legionnaire, "does not matter for he is wearing the uniform of France and is therefore our enemy whatever his nationality. You are aware that one of our men has been sentenced to death in Marignac for carrying out his duty in the furtherance of our cause to obtain freedom from you French. We are holding you people hostage against our own! If in our case as gallibious you will be shot and your heads will be sent to the French Military Department as proof that we mean business. You will be set free the moment our man gets free in Algeria and is freed by the French."

The Frenchman said, "You can't kill me. You will have the whole French Army down on you. Not one of you will live."

"Monsieur," the Algerian said coldly, "You are talking nonsense. We already have the whole French ARMY against us." The Algerian spoke in Arabic to his companion. I understood Arabic quite well and knew that he was telling the man to ease our bonds a little.

"I will pay you," Albert Quirke said plaintively. "I am quite rich. I will pay you well to set me free."

The Algerian shrugged helplessly as he said, "This is not a question of money, Monsieur, but of a man's life. We must use all the means at our disposal to have our own men."

"Will you at least free us from these bonds?" Danielle Pihl asked. "My arms and legs are very gone."

"I have already given instructions, Mademoiselle, for this to be done, but in case any of you thinks of getting away, let me tell you that you are in a basement far under a street in Oran in a building which the police and army will never suspect. You cannot escape and if you try, you will be killed and other prisoners will be taken to be held as hostages," the Algerian warned. The man and his companion marched on. The light was extinguished and we were alone, with our bonds still tied, for about 10 minutes when the light came on again and with a grating of a key and chattering sound of a lifting bar the door was swung open.

Four Algerians marched into the room. One jerked me over and another jerked Quirke to a sitting position. A third man handled the woman more gently as he helped her to sit erect against the wall. Then two dragged the legionnaire into the centre of the floor of the room, which I reckoned was about 12 feet by 14 feet, quite a bare room, but windowless except for a grating high in the far east wall through which some air filtered.

The same bearded Algerian walked into the room and stood just inside the doorway. "I am a captain in the Algerian national army," he said. "I have orders from my superiors to execute this man."

"Second act on in ten minutes . . . slip into these costumes . . ."

he indicated the legionnaire who was lying partly on his side. His eyes wide open, staring up at the Algerian, "We have to prove to the French Military Department that we are not killing, that we have you people as prisoners and that we will carry out our threat unless our men is released safely to us. You will each write a note which I will dictate to the Military Department telling them that you are our prisoners, that you witnessed the execution and dismemberment of this legionnaire and that we have been told you that you will likewise be executed and dismembered unless our man is set free."

The Algerian barked an order and the four men closed in on two sides on the legionnaire. One man had a revolver in his hand and pointed on the floor and pressed the rounds against the soldier's head at the base of the skull.

As the legionnaire struggled with his bonds, Danielle Pihl screamed, "You can't kill a man in cold blood like that! How do you hope to help your people by murder? I shall testify against you one day. I shall see you shot!"

The Algerian captain barked an order and the gun spat a leaden slug into the soldier's head. His body jerked but the bonds did not yield. For a moment or two the body twitched, then relaxed. The captain snapped another order and one of the men produced a long-bladed two-edged dagger-like knife, severing the man's throat. The French woman screamed and then sagged back.

I felt sick and wanted to vomit and tried closing my eyes against the brutal sight, but I did not have enough willpower. I was forced by some kind of hypnotic trance to watch the final butchering. Quirke, I saw out of a corner of my eye, was watching with mouth hanging open, saliva trickling down his chin and jacket front.

The captain snapped another order and I saw one of the men, with the dagger dripping with blood, slice through the bonds which held the woman's ankles together and then ran through her wrist bands. The man came to me and freed my hands and feet and then freed those of Quirke.

"I shall be back in a few minutes with the paper and pencil for you to write your notes," the captain said. "I shall then also have this person's body removed."

As they marched from the room and slammed the door, the lights went out. I crawled over the floor, still suffering the agonies in my half-free wrists and legs and a spilling head from the doped drink, until

(Continued on page 47)

THE SILENT TIGER

Big, ballying Gant goaded Grenfell at every opportunity. Still, the newcomer wouldn't fight . . . till the day he showed us why he had refused . . . and Gant lay at his feet, his face smashed to a pulp by those terrible tearing fangs.

It was a typical blue-hot island day when Grenfell stepped off the boat from the mainland. His shirt was open down to his waistband; his coat hooked by one finger over his shoulder, his other hand holding an omelette bag.

He was a big man, beautifully proportioned, tan-skinned, wide-shouldered, slim-torped. He walked slowly down the jetty, looking from side to side at the passing boats in the dying light, his nostrils dilating a little to the smell of tar, salt and green.

He looked like a man coming back to a familiar place, and standing there watching him, I knew he was a saltwater man returning to a life he knew.

And suddenly studying him as he sat on the breakwater railing a cigarette, I felt there was something familiar about him—as if I had known him in another environment far removed from the fresh smell of the sea and the wind across the Passage.

I came across and sat down, too. "Good day," I said. "Welcome to Ganett Island. I'm Jim Doherty. Run a private trawler out of here."

"Yes, mate." He passed over the machine and I rolled a smoke. "I'm Les Grenfell . . . from Montreal."

The expression that I had seen him before was edging more strongly into my consciousness.

"Never been up this way before," he went on. "Thought I've worked on gneissites."

"I reckoned you had."

I drew hard on the smoke, silent a minute. Then:

"I feel I've seen you before somewhere."

He looked at me quickly.

"You mustn't . . . I've been down terrible ways."

"Only passed through. It was somewhere else, though."

And suddenly I seemed to hear the voices roar of a big crowd in the distance . . . a picture came: a man stretched out on the canvas of a squared ring, fist on his face; another man, in a corner, man's hands on his shoulder, restraining him.

Now at last the expression was more than that. It was knowledge, sharp and clear.

"You're 'Fury' Magee," I said. "Montague Bay, 1928 . . . Berney Hanson wasn't expected to live."

There was a tremble about his eyes now . . . a resignation.

"Gone."

"So nothing, mate. I just called you to mind, that's all. Troubles me when I can't place a job. I've seen some places. I was down south on holidays when I saw that fight. Later on I met you at a party at the Cross. You were sick, Les."

"That was 1928, Jim," Grenfell said. "After the Bokito fight I gave it away for good . . . drifted west for a while . . . even up the Inside Passage back south unless I pick up a job round here."

"I need a boatman," I told him. "You look like you know your way around a trawler. My last man quit; gone up to Rum Jungle."

"Thanks, Jim. I'll take it. Mr.—Les Grenfell's my real name. 'Fury' Magee's dead. Leave him be, Jim. We talk around the pub, that."

I couldn't see, really. "Fury" Magee had been one of the best of the young crop of heroes, and 1928 had been a vintage year. Why he should want to hide it, I didn't know, but I wasn't a giddy man, and if he wanted it kept quiet, then that was his business.

"Just one thing, Les: why did you retire? You were going to the top of the heap—fast."

"That's dead, too, I hope, with 'Fury' Magee. After I nearly killed Hanson, I just up 'er quit. Let's leave it at that, eh?"

"Sure, Les."

"Thanks, mate. Where's this boat of yours?"

"The 'Island Queen'. There she is, over there."

"Nice job, Jim. You've got yourself a boat."

I showed him over her, and when we came back, we walked along the beach to my weatherboard house back from the still water.

There was a man working the pebbles banks when we came along: a big man, and more heavily built than Grenfell.

A girl was with him: a girl in very short shorts, flimsy low top, sticking up and out with the round anatomy of her throbbing breasts. She had long, slim legs, flat stomach, and shapely thighs.

She stopped Grenfell in his tracks.

"Who's the crew, Jim?"

"Venus Trapsayne. She's Joe Gant's girl. That's Mr. Gant, Kara a trawler, too. Gets her ar' rents books on the side."

She was looking at Grenfell, too—hard, the way his girls had on and liked it, because she knew he was looking at her as a woman.

"Dame, but, Les," I said.

"Yan, I've seen 'til like that before. They come knocking on the door of your pub bathroom. You don't even know 'em."

And now Big Joe Gant was standing, too.

"Joe's girl, you said?"

"Joe's girl . . . Jackie . . . Tessa! Any big, good-looking joker with a body on him. Only she don't get much chance to play with Joe around Joe's tough, Les . . . only I don't reckon she'll worry you."

And suddenly he went funny again. He looked away from the girl quickly, and walked on in silence. It seemed as if with the mention of possible trouble with Joe Gant he had lost interest in the girl.

I settled him in the back room of the weatherboard house. He hadn't much gear with him, except a change of clothes in the suitcase bag.

"I can let you have a bit of stuff," I told him. "You won't need much more: a pair of shorts to work in. You can pick up some more duds in the township tomorrow."

In the morning we worked on some net repair jobs on the beach. It was a lovely, blue-golden day, and Les Grenfell drank it all in, glad to be back within the smell and sound of the sea.

It was inevitable, of course, that Venus Trapsayne should come around. I should have expected it, now man and all. There was little left to attract her in an old bleached and pickled bearing like him.

So she came along that morning, her slim, matronized body aglow with vitality, her black eyes twinkling, eyes for Grenfell.

He tried his best to her, working on the net. I knew even by the look of his back that he was trying hard not to turn round.

She sat down on a packing case, swinging one bare leg, the other clasped by her hands. She looked seriously possessive—and I wished there was some sickness that would shed the years from me.

"Why don't you get lost?"

"How are they runnin', Jim?" she asked me, watching the muscles ripple on Grenfell's bare, tanned back as he worked at the art.

"Fine, Vinnie," I said. Then, I added, pointedly: "Where's Joe?"

"Over on Ugari Beach." She frowned at my mention of him. "Who's the new boy?"

"Les—Les Grenfell. Hey, Les, get here wants to meet you."

He stood up and turned, coming over, taking her all in.

"This is Vinnie Tremayne. You saw her yesterday on the beach."

"Yeah," Grenfell said. "Hi, Vinnie."

"Hi, yourself!" The way she said it, it was almost a caress. "Where you from, daddy—right out of a dream boat?"

She had the devil with her now—and right there in front of me, he was climbing on Grenfell's shoulder.

"Nemesis, originally. Then Syd—er—er—then points west an' north."

"Gettin', daddy—still! Ganche Island needs you."

"I reckon I might, Vinnie, if Jim don't die me the minute we go over the bar."

"Jim needs a good business. The years have crack up on him."

Her tone of voice discounted me in the way the young discount those so much older.

"Jim sees you're Joe's girl."

Her ice drew a circle in the sand.

"Reverendness, Les?" she flicked at him. "Don't tell me; let me guess. You've only been here two shades of a hairbreadth till an' you're worried about Joe Gun?"

He flushed. She was enjoyed herself.

"I'm not worryin'."

12 ADAM, JUNE, 1951

She came around plenty after that, and just when I got the idea that Les Grenfell was seeing her I didn't quite know. I suppose it was when he came home late the first time, staggering a little tame. The second time he came home late I was sure of it.

It was a Saturday night, and I'd been in on a poker game with the old fishermen down on the flats. I wasn't yet in bed.

As he passed me I caught a faint suspicion of the skin perfume she used to pretty up for her dates Apple Blossom. I think it was, and she used a lot of it, and its perfume clung.

So in the morning I said:

"Vinnie you run to, Les?"

"Yea, I'm seen' her. If that's what you mean. We had the bunch out for a spin to the mainland. Some nightin' we go swimmin' on Ugari Beach."

"There's a lot of fish, Les—harpoonin' them."

I left it at that, but he wasn't at his best in the morning, so he cracked back with:

"Okay, Jim, my old day she's Joe's girl, sir? You holdin' a grudge by the tail, so what the hell?"

"I ain't sayin' anything, Les. You're talkin'. Not me."

"Joe Gun't got the scared, or something?"

"I don't know, Les. His hell?"

I hadn't meant anything by the last bit, but suddenly I saw it had gone home, under his skin. He seemed to be awfully touchy on that subject, almost as if, by making an issue of it, he was trying to convince himself that he wasn't afraid of a showdown with Gant.

"You and your 'Let's build a little house of our own' patter . . ."

But I couldn't see why it was even humanly possible that he was afraid of facing such a physical issue. True, Joe was good with his fists; he was big, fit and strong, but then, two-three years back, Len Greenfield had been knocking on the doors of all the Australian top-flight boxers, and his retirement from the ring would in no way have diminished his own particularistic skill.

He hadn't gone to bed, he was still young; he was still more or less the man he was when he was knocking over the best of them.

I let it ride. It was all very peculiar, but I didn't want problems over the morning cup of tea.

It all boiled up that night in the bar of the local Greenfield and I strolled down after tea for a couple of cold ones and we were halfway through the second round when Joe Gant and his bestman came in.

Joe had been drinking earlier in the afternoon, and he was in an ugly mood. Greenfield saw him come in, and half-turned his back, still talking to me and a couple of net fishermen from the flats.

Gant saw him at once, and moved up closer along the bar, bringing his drink with him.

"Hello, Jim." He spoke to me, but he was watching Greenfield. "How 'till your new bestman does a lot of night swimmin' over on Uruguay."

So it was common, I sighed wearily. I'd seen it all so often when anybody looked at Vannie Tramayne. Nobody did . . . now, except Greenfield, the unknown quantity.

"I wouldn't know, Joe," I told him. "Just ads here there when I go to see a movie? Is all I care."

Greenfield was pouring into his drink.

"He has company, too, Jim." Gant went on, still nodding. "A pretty girl, Jim . . . my girl."

And so now it was cut.

Slowly Greenfield turned, and faced Gant over his glass.

"You got another" he said, Joe, you will not."

"So he talks at last," Joe Gant grinned. "You're here around here, tell 'em. Haven't anybody given you the story on Vannie?"

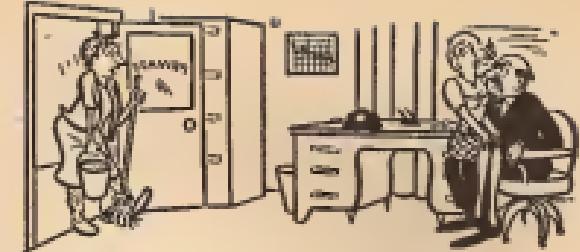

"I got the message, Joe. So damn much I could set a tune to it."

"Then you know what happens to jokers who put their long bills into what don't concern 'em."

I could see there was a restraint on Greenfield, imposed on him by some inner force. There was anger in his eyes, but it wasn't showing in his voice, which was low and quiet.

"I can guess."

He turned his back on Gant, and went on talking to me. There was a little white smile about his nose, and his nostrils were flaring now, but his voice was still calm and his hands steady as he rolled a cigarette.

It was obvious now that he wasn't going to accept Joe's challenge, and I couldn't help wondering if he were afraid. But that couldn't slack up—not with Greenfield's earlier ring record. Hard and some hard, vicious fights. And one of the tough guys would have brought out the white feather.

Maybe the fact that he'd almost killed young Weston was holding back. Many fighters lost their skins after a ring accident. Subconsciously you pulled your punches . . . watered down the killer instinct. That's so necessary for championship class. You slowed up when you had your map pretty . . . you thought it would happen again.

Perhaps that was Greenfield's trouble. I didn't know. All I knew was he was side-stepping big Joe Gant, and that the rathole-fishing crew wouldn't respect him any more.

Poly . . . he was a good bestman. So I talked back to him, pretending nothing had happened.

I heard Gant laugh . . . and then his hand fell hard on Greenfield's shoulder, twisted, and spun Greenfield round to face him.

At the same time his other fist was on the way to Greenfield's face.

Greenfield moved in a blur of speed. His left hand shot up like a striking snake, hand open. There was a smash as Gant's fist landed in Greenfield's open palm. His hand closed, gripped to power-packed whiteness . . . and there was a moment of immobility as strength met strength.

Their bodies tensed, almost quivered, and then Greenfield's smooth, trained power forced Gant's hand and arm inexorably toward his body.

Then he let go and stood facing Gant, cold and calm.

Gant's mouth opened like a stranded fish. He didn't say a word as Greenfield moved toward the bar door.

At the swing of the flags, he got his voice back.

"You'll keep, boy, you'll keep!"

I saw then that his fingers were still closed, still paralyzed by the force of Greenfield's amazing grip.

The bar door flags swayed to and fro behind Greenfield as he crossed the low verandah of the pub and down the few steps.

Vannie Tramayne was climbing on "Top price again for this lot, Len," I grunted. "Ain't you sorry you're here?"

"Yes, I'm sorry, Jim. You've been a good mate."

We came back to the anchorage on Gannet later in the morning, with the catch tied down against the rising temperature, and I knew there was going to be trouble as soon as I saw Gant, his two belly bags, and all people, Winnie Tremayne, on the wide-grassed flat back from the little stone jetty.

Grenfell tied up, and stood there, watching Gant, as I hopped from the trawler to the stone decking of the jetty.

Gant was grinning. At his feet was a full bin of kerassine.

"A full hold, Jim?" he asked, as Grenfell and I moved off the little jetty, walking slowly. There was that same little patch of white about Grenfell's nostrils.

"We had a good run, Joe," I said evenly. "You want somethin'?"

"You've been pretty easy about that now around you've been workin'?"

"Not a new ground really, Joe. We happened to strike 'em a bit thicker on the last few runs."

I gave it to him quickly. I didn't want to precipitate anything at this stage—not with Gant and his two belly bags . . . and Grenfell still an uncertain quantity.

Gant was in a contentious mood, with just enough steam up to make him dangerous.

"There's nothin' you not tied down in the hold now—a dose of kerassine wouldn't improve their market value, would it?"

He was speaking quietly, nodding me, looking at Grenfell occasionally to see how he was taking it. Grenfell made no move, although there tense and with his hands white-clenched at his sides.

Winnie Tremayne and the other two stood off a bit, just watching. The girl's face was aglow with an expectancy that spread into her eyes and I knew she was waiting for a clash between Gant and Len Grenfell. There was a thickness about her though I didn't quite like.

Gant left the kerassine and moved toward the entrance to the little jetty. He was completely sure of himself, of his own power backed by the two henchmen.

It was a clean issue now: me, Gant, and Grenfell and the press the lead-down catch in the hold of the "Island Queen".

I moved in front of him. He stopped, smiled thinly, and put down his kerassine.

"You're gettin' a bit long in the teeth for a roughhouse, Jim."

He was working himself into the mood now . . . and I knew I had no chance. I'd been too long on the beach.

My foot crushed against the side of the kerassine tin. It fell over, and the screw top was loose. The kerassine gurgled out and soaked into the sage grass.

And then Gant hit me. I felt his fist go wrist-deep in my belly, and there was an awful sucking inside. My breath pushed out and I fell at his feet. In a state of pain and breathlessness, I saw his foot go

"Well, if the shark didn't bring me down, how did you spend your honeymoon, reading?"

the footpath, her eyes on Grenfell. There was an insolence about her as she stood there, staring at him. It was obvious she'd been waiting for the outcome of Gant's facing of Grenfell.

Grenfell didn't speak . . . moved past her and crossed the road.

Gant came out on to the low verandah of the pub, and Grenfell heard his voice, sharp and clear:

"He chickened out . . ."

Grenfell could feel the eyes of the watchers touching his back with little jolts of psychological electricity and hear the broken record inside his head:

"He chickened out . . . he chickened out . . ."

On top of it all, there was Winnie Tremayne, laughing on a high note.

At the end of the month we struck a good run of prawns in a patch on the eastern end of the archipelago on the top of Chatham Island, and we made some good hauls, which brought top prices.

Gant's hauls were not much above average at the time, and whether or not he was jealousy on his part, or just plain desire, I don't know, but he began to include me in his campaign of baiting his belly bags.

Grenfell didn't go to the pub now, Gant was there with his boatmen, and they always sought Grenfell out for their peculiar sense of Hi-awatha humor.

He didn't even say out at night, and so I wasn't surprised when he said one evening after tea:

"I'm pullin' out soon; you can get another man, Jim."

"I'm sorry, Len."

"Yah, me, too. This is a good place. We got on fine."

"Len, it'll be like this other place, sometimes, too, unless . . ."

"Yeah, I know the drill. Gant's not unique. You don't have to tell me that."

"Well, then . . . ? You've only to step 'em down."

"It's not as simple as that, Jim. Just look around for another boatman, eh?"

In the morning early we put out for another run over our new patch, and Gant was following us at a distance as we moved out of the anchorage in the creek.

"Well, here him in the archipelago, Len, as they cut a wide circle to the grants."

I gave the engine the gun, and we abated Gant a glass pair of hooks. In the course of little islands we finally lost him.

The crowd was jumping with prawns and we filled the hold with one of the best catches of the season.

back—and somewhere, deep in the room, I knew he was going to slip me.

You don't need that, Joe . . . you don't need the slipper for me. Then, from a distance, I heard Granfield's voice, crackling sharp and clear, like a whip:

"What?"

And the snap of a stopped chain in his truck. Barely his foot came down the track.

There was Granfield, tearing off his shirt, stripping to shorts and bare feet. There was Granfield, stark and severe.

There, too, was Vinny Trapperson, laughing quietly, without humor.

"It's you you want, Gant—not Joe, not the prima. It's been me, all the time."

"Yer, it's you, Granfield."

He was tearing at his own shirt, so if afraid Granfield would change his mind. It was all out in the open now: elemental, free of coaxed trapping . . . and the atmosphere was almost a sort of relief.

Gant threw the first punch: a long left that Granfield got underneath, hammering two short ones, left and right, into Gant's middle, hitting two red marks that moved forward, fast, buckling Granfield, using his greater weight.

The bear hadn't yet given him a belly, and he was fit and strong, packed like a hornet with the salt from the sea. He had two punches on Granfield's face now as Granfield moved round him, boxing off a rush.

I had recovered somewhat, and I was on my feet, still sort of indecided, but well enough to see Granfield's smooth power, his practised punching, and all the ring-trained skill of him.

"Is this the one you're keeping Reverend Jackson on standby basis for?"

Gant was good: I'd always known that. He had courage, too, and he'd given Granfield a run for it. There was a smile of satisfaction on his face, and I heard his voice, as they sat in a couch:

"So you can handle your docks, Granfield. No point in winnin' a fight against a man who can't use his hands."

Granfield broke, and hammered the words away with a snarling left. A following right came over fast, and Gant's head snapped back.

I don't know when it was I got the idea, but the fight wasn't five minutes old before I felt that Granfield was enlarging it. It was in the look in his eyes, the intenseness of his face: the same way he came into Gant, chopping hard with left and right. He was parading his knuckles as they landed, to grip Gant's skin, and already the big bear's face was cracking apart.

Granfield came at him in a two-fisted smash, and already Gant's top lip was open to the teeth from nostril to mouth, and there were welts on both sides of his face. But Gant hit him toe to toe, and they slugged out a fierce two minutes that would have had any fight crowd in the world roaring to its feet.

I had no brief for Gant, but I had to hand it to him: he had guts, and the instinct and will to fight, like a fierce animal. He was mean, with cruelty in him, and I had seen him dish out beatings to other men on the island, and I supposed he had a threatening coming, but not even on Gant would I have wished one like this.

"You bet I'll step outside and say that. Walk right here."

(Continued on page 28)

Whenever a rep-building killer hit town, Lawman Starker had always packed a hole card to back his bluff . . . But today, against this blazing-eyed young glory-hunter, he held only

FICTION • LLOYD ERIC REEVE

IT HAPPENED about a mile south of town, just before noon. And it would have been a trivial enough thing at almost any other time.

What gave it importance was in what Frank North said, some 20 minutes afterwards. When John Starker rode up to the adobe jail office. Actually, as soon as he saw Frank listening there in his spiky white storefront's open porch, Starker had a misgiving of something amiss, yet neither nor Frank knew, for that matter, showed it particularly as they talked casually a moment later.

All Frank said, when Starker had swung down a little awkwardly from his sweat-painted horse, was, "Ben Hogan's in town, John. Not enough for you?"

"Could fry eggs on a flat rock," Starker said. With his left hand he jabbed up the rim of his flat-crowned California hat, and drew the backs of two fingers across his gleaming forehead, striking off bands of sweat with a snapping motion.

"Where is he?"

"In the Bird Cage, Painting his toenails with a little coffin varnish. Men sure can talk. Got his tongue hung in the middle so's he can wag it at both ends."

Starker grunted faintly. "Heard he was a talker. The young ones generally are. Don't always mean they're bluffers, though."

"No," Frank said. "Already pulled a couple of switchies on the handle of his persuader. Just ventrilo. I hear. Only trouble, it's gone to his head. Wants a town marshal now. Figures one like you can give him just the name he hankers for."

Starker sighed. "Lots of pretenders get themselves killed that way. All some of them need is a bit of barking. This is, you can't always figure which spec."

"This one's got some poison in him," North said. "Leastwise, if it was me, I wouldn't take chances."

"Sometimes," Starker mused, "not taking the chance is what a man can't afford. This young Hogan — word gets around. The way I hear, he got talking in some town down south a while back, and let his tongue run away with him again, seemin' my name came up, and he says as how he could take me, and the next thing he knows he's saying as how he's going to take me. Northie said it, he can't back down. Just painted himself into a corner. Well, well see. I'm destined to run, Frank."

"Just thought I'd like to know," North said. "Anyways, stay out of the sun, John. Man could get a heat stroke, they like this." He sauntered down the wooden walk, back toward the flat front of his beat-battered store.

Starker watched him go. Except the stoopsgate's stocky figure, the boardwalks on either side of the dusty street were deserted, which might have been a little unusual at the hour, except that by now word had likely spread that young Ben Hogan was in town.

A moment longer Starker stood there, vaguely brooding, a tall, raw-boned man, not quite raddled-and-spared, his drooping mustache touched with iron-gray, and with quiet eyes from which all color had long ago been drained. His gaze lifted past the jail office to a small shack which stood down the street, where Doc Kenney's wrangler-beaten shingle swayed with faint complaints in the vagrant and scorching breath of air.

He'd meant to drop in on the doc before riding into his own office. But now he questioned the impulse. This unexpected play had come on, and to talk with the doc now could force it prematurely, and in a way he was not yet sure he wanted. So, after another glance, he just stepped across the walk and into the jail office. He sat down behind his cluttered desk, passed through a drawer and found and lit a cigar. A good cigar always helped him think.

He didn't know how much time he had. Nothing might happen for hours. But then again the sudden challenge of Hogan's appearance in the street could come any minute.

It would be just Hogan alone, of course, to go in since to see everyone that would settle everything. Though still not just in the way he would have it. This was his fourth tall town, and in none of them, as far as least, had the citizens who paid him had much to complain about in the way he kept to their frontier version of law and order.

And without much killing, too. In fact the legend about his gun was grossly over-rated. For quite practical reasons he kept it to himself that he had sent to their maker only two of the dozen or more belted to his credit. He wasn't particularly fast. Certainly he had none of Wild Bill's speed, or Buffalo Bill Cody's circus tricks, nor even the slow and deadly accuracy of Wyatt Earp. Yet Bill was dead, with a bullet in his back, Cody did all his shooting in leather dress to hand music, and his own town had been as orderly at least as any of Earp's.

He'd long ago learned that calmness, and the impact of his own iron-willed resolution, and maybe just a sense of humor, was about as trustworthy as any split-second draw or magic aim. He'd lost count of all the drunks and brash youngsters and even authentic badmen he'd faced, always with wonder in their eyes, and still had walked them down and disarmed them. Sometimes at the last minute, of course, he'd had to dig a few plumb-poles the hard with the barrel of his six-shooter.

But always before, he had known he would draw and fire if it came to that. That he could kill. But if it came to it today, could he kill young Ben Hogan? He didn't think so.

That was the difference. Always before he'd hold a card or two if his bluff failed. A hole card. And today he didn't. He held nothing today, and he guessed only a fool would refuse to throw down his hand and wait out a better deal.

Well then, he thought, I'm a fool.

It wasn't so much what would be said about him later, if he walked out on it today. Because there would be those who would claim — there always were — that he had fashioned the White Justice deliberately, out of whole cloth. Not that, but rather his own clear awareness that to back down even once would strip him forever of the halo of invulnerability. That, and just the distaste to turning his back on something he had been forced to do, spending a little time in these scattered segments of the frontier through which his life was passing.

He straightened the cigar and stepped to the open door. It cleared the sidewalk and landed in the street with a small puff of dust. There was nothing else now but wait. He sat there, in the open head of the small office, without impatience, watching the sun gradually beat the bleached dust of the street beyond the door, drying the sweat with his face and wiping out of his armpits and down across his ribs.

Faintly he heard a faint chattering of teethless against the boardwalk. They started distantly and grew steadily louder. He waited patiently, knowing it wouldn't be Hogan — not yet — but an answer, for this was how it was done. A moment later a young cowhand started around the other door and came inside, his eyes kindling a little with morbid excitement.

Starker's gaze was gently chiding. "Take it easy, son," he said. "Could knock a jumpy man right into shooting you, time like this. Get something in your grub."

"It's Ben Hogan," the cowboy started. "Aint you heard? He's in town."

THE

GUN THAT FAILED

"I heard," Starker said.

"He sent me to kill you."

"Tell me what? That he's coming out?"

The cowboy nodded. "Gave to tell you either fish or cat hair."

"All right, son," Starker said.

"You've told me."

The cowboy hesitated, but at Starker said nothing further, asked,

"You coming out and breaking him?"

Starker grunted faintly. "Let him know that art out for himself, son. Do him good to think about it — or rather, maybe, do me some good. But it's a hot day, son, better stay indoors a while. Ranting around outside this way you could get a brainstroke, or something, anyway."

The cowboy grimaced. "That all you want me to tell him?"

"Yes," Starker said, and then, on impulse: "No, tell him I know he'll reach him, that his kind never have the nerve to wait, a man out, say it is a way to make him mad, son. You do me that favor."

The cowboy's eyes flared a little.

"You going to try to just walk him down?" he asked. "You try that and you'll get yourself killed over Hogan's bad."

"Well," Starker said. "But not quite as bad as he thinks he is, well, we'll see. Man along now and give him my respects, such as they are."

He kept walking and suddenly there was less than four feet between them.

The cowboy left. For another moment Starker was motionless, letting a stillness grow within, and then he stood up slowly. He didn't pull and check his six-shooter or even ease it in its holster. He just moved to the doorway, a little stiffly, and stood leaning in it, looking down the street toward the Red Camp Saloon. His eyes squinted against the iron glare of sunlight. He watched the cowboy crossing the street toward the saloon. The cowboy's boots kicked puffs of dust. He went around the building, where several cowpokes stood, three-legged and with dropped heads.

Even at this distance Starker recognized the horse, and saw that one was alien, and knew that it would be Hogan's. The cowboy's boots struck loudly across the wooden walk. He knocked open the saloon's swinging doors with a rattling bang of his shoulder and went inside.

No life moved in the street now.

Only a small swirl of dust, building up in a thin gust of heat, eddying about aimlessly for a minute, and then settling suddenly to feather itself.

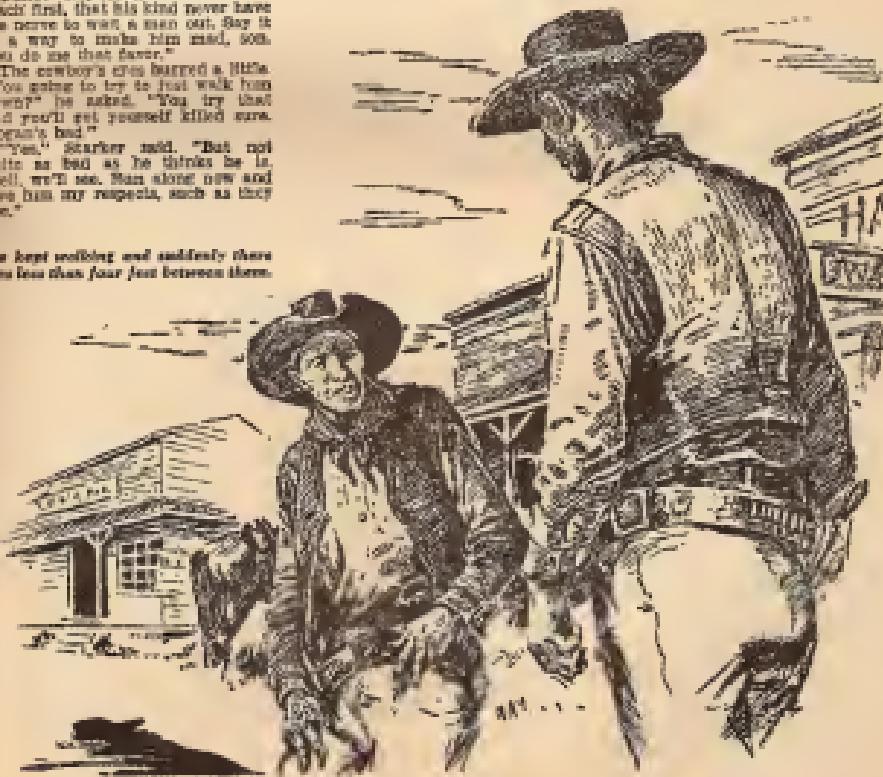

Otherwise silently a cow buried.

A dog barked furiously, enough once before an open window, regarding Starker that at every window or doorway now, from all abandoned vacant points, people were staring and watching, unseen.

He was detached now from the population. Alone.

Five minutes must have passed, and then the battered doors flapped suddenly, and Ben Hogan walked out. He stood on the sidewalk for an instant, craning his head toward the narcotics office, blinking his eyes into adjustment from the sun's heavier dusk to the sister's white and threatening glare.

"Lady, I don't see how I can take no for an answer!"

Starker waited in his office doorway, shrouded in shadow. He had never set eyes on Hogan before, and yet somehow the man was clearly familiar, cracked as so many before in a changeless violence, sensed by instinct as perhaps any natural enemy is always sensed.

A big youth, with a suggestion of massive strength asserting through his high and cat-footedlessness, and his hair, bushing out from under the battered sombrero, showing even at this distance his brash yellow color.

Letting the tension build in him, the maniac waited in that shadowed doorway. There was pain in his body. But he was scarcely aware of it. hadn't been since Frank North had first spoken to him. The pain was only an inner throb, a bright core of hurt, serving only to centre and sharpen his impulsive attention to the moment.

Hogan moved suddenly. He went into the street as though threat there be a bursting of pent-up violence. He started forward with a slow, strutting stalk, like an angry rooster, that sent back from his bootheels spaced little explosions of dust.

All Starker waited, motionless, as Hogan came on some 50 feet. Uncertainty showed then. He came to a halt, eyes suddenly roving, lashing the empty street with suspicion. A little scarcely he hurried his voice at the jun office. "Starker! You coming out? Or do I come in after you?"

arm, crooked slightly with mild threat, he might simply have been en his way to the saloon for a drink. So far he hadn't even looked at Hogan.

Gazing at him, Hogan seemed a little confused now. He turned sideways to face him, still idling along the sidewalk. He shouted at him, "Get into the car, will you? Can't you fight like a man? If you don't go for your gun, I'll—"

Starker spoke then, for the first time, his soft, flat voice carrying clearly through the hot bush. "Now listen," he said, "you don't have to tell me that. I'm not in the next county. Use up all your wind."

He stepped off the sidewalk, shadow toward Hogan, but still with that taunting master-of-the-paste. His gaze, dazing and a little amazed, seemed to hold Hogan lightly leashed. He walked toward him slowly, with the same certain he would approach a spooky young horse.

Some you could gentle Some had to have the sense just beat into them. Only a few, the crazed killers, had to be done away with. But how could you ever tell which was which? Until too late.

Less than 10 feet separated them. Hogan's glare had dimmed a little. A glimmer was coming into his eyes, and Starker watched this closely. Hogan's right hand poised like a claw above his gun. It quivered, and Starker spoke instantly. "Now, son," he said, "I wouldn't if I was you. You know I'll drop you if you try it. I always can. But I'd do so goddam. What you want to die for? You're fucking, boy, young. Think of all you got to do yet . . ."

"Now remember, when I tag on my ear you actually lift the hem of your shirt and dab it at your eyes."

All the time he talked he was gathering closer. Only about 20 feet separated them now. He said more sharply, "Anyway, you're wounded too long. This place I couldn't help getting you even if you hit me first. Which you wouldn't."

He kept walking, unhesitatingly, and yet suddenly there was less than four feet between them, with Hogan's Wild gun drawing itself in the soft mystery of Starker's quiet dominance. And it was only then, at the last second, that Hogan's hand exploded toward his gun, so thoughts finally turned itself loose from the post of an almost hypnotized body.

It clapped the handle of the weapon, drawing it up from the holster, and at the same instant Starker struck his wrist with a quick chop of his left hand. He knocked the gun aside just as it cracked flinty. The bullet spattered dust a few feet to one side, and Starker's fingers舞ed around the wrist with a hard twist. The gun fell from suddenly agonized fingers, still screaming to use his right hand. Starker gave him a flat push against the chest, staggering him backward. Then he bent suddenly, snapping up the fallen gun, and straightened, letting it dangle loosely at his side.

None of the brutal recklessness was left in Hogan's face. Nor even anger. He just looked sullen and defeated. And somehow, too, almost relaxed.

Starker's faint grin went a little bleak. "Now, son," he said. "You not sure I'm doing this right. Better sometimes just to get rid of the bad ones. Except you're not near as bad as you think. Might be you even got something worth saving. Anyway we'll chance it."

Hogan said nothing, and the man-shield paused, considering. "Won't ever stick you in the jailhouse to cool off," he finally decided. "It good for cooling off in this weather anyway. Son, why don't you just get on your horse and start going away from here. And don't come back. You wouldn't like it around here now, the way folks would kind of laugh. Starker pride'd be scared never to start any fistfights anywhere now, the way word will get around how you couldn't make this one stick. What I mean, just stop trying to be such a bad son, and you'll get along fine. All right, move sister."

Young Hogan looked up, a little softly, and then he looked away. But a thin hand almost started at the corners of his mouth. He turned abruptly, his feet shuffling some now, and walked back to the hitch rack. He climbed up on his horse and wheeled it away and rode slowly out of town. He didn't look back.

Starker, gradually conscious again of the pain within, watched him go. He was pretty sure Hogan would never again expose himself to this town's remembering grins. To tame them and still not break their spirit — all a man could do was try, never sure he was right, but still having to do it in the only way he knew. He went back to the sidewalk and turned toward the jail office.

"Get out," he said. "Make out!" I said. And he did."

He heard a murmur of talk behind, as a small crowd neared out of the Bird Cage now, but he didn't look back. His gaze found Frank North just ahead, standing in the door of his store, looking behind his white grocer's apron.

Frank ground at him, "Won't it ever cool off?" he complained. "That was a good job. John said, you're a fool, walking around in this sun. A heat stroke had."

"Come winter," Starker said, "we can change the subject. I might have done wrong, Frank, but I reckon I'm just not cut out to be a butcher." He went on, coming about, of Doc Emett's stamp, three doors before his own, and he peered, considering, and the Doc, standing toe in the doorway, looked surprised.

The Doc said, "I'd heard about you doing that, John, but never knew I'd live to see it." He stepped backward as Starker came inside. "It's what their call confidence, I guess. Never doubted for an instant you could drop him if you had to, did you?"

"Well, maybe," Starker said. "Wanted to see you, Doc, before the interruption. Head out to serve a process this morning. Got down on the way back to tighten the chicken. Slipped on a rock. Fool thing to do. Caught myself on my hand." He extended his right hand still stiff and wooden in its movement. The Doc took hold of the hairy wrist, his fingers prying, and Starker, winzing slightly, said, "Broke, ain't it?"

The Doc cursed softly as he nodded. "Clean as a whistle," he said. "Why, you couldn't even have lifted your hand from the holder, let alone fire it. Here, I'll have to set that and get some splints on."

Starker's grin was faintly gone. "What was that, doc?" he asked. "You was saying about confidence?"

Doc Emett was already at work on the wrist. He answered without looking up. "Well, hell," he said. "I still say it was confidence. Maybe that's a hole card any man has, if he just knows it. Confidence in yourself, John. Why, damn it to hell and gone, I say it more than ever now."

"Don't be silly . . . What's in it for me?"

ONE HOT NIGHT IN ORAN

(Continued from page 28)

I reached the woman and took her hand from the floor and cradled it in my arm until she recovered her consciousness.

"They killed him! They killed him!" she kept repeating over and over again. "I saw them murder the poor man."

I spoke softly to her, tried to calm her and presently she settled in my arm, sobbing but more composed. It was more than half an hour before the captain and two Algerian rebel soldiers appeared. Meanwhile the corpse of the lieutenant lay heaving in the dark somewhere just at my feet. I tried not to think of it and not to think that exactly the same thing would happen to us but somehow I was not afraid. I know that I should have been afraid, but fear was something I did not experience just then.

I have heard it said that shock will drive fear from a man's mind. I must have been in some kind of shock for although I knew well enough that the French Government would never surrender the rebels lying under sentence of death, I was not afraid at that moment.

When the door opened again, the captain and two men walked into the room. Two of the men removed the corpse and the captain handed each of us a sheet of paper and pencil and dictated the brief note which we had to write to the Military Department and to him. Then a man appeared carrying a small folding camera with a flash-light attachment and took a picture of each of us where we sat against the wall.

"If they think we are blufing, they will have to think again tonight," the rebel captain said. "For tonight they will receive your letters and your photographs attached to them so that they can see you, and also the head of their dead adversary. He was not a Frenchman. His paper showed that he was another European. A man who kills another country's babies must expect to die as he did. He deserves no better. We will presently bring you some food. You will not be badly treated while you are here if you do as we say."

The room was in darkness again. It was odd to me that we could hear nothing—no footsteps, no voices—once the door was closed. I figured that it must be a very thick door.

"What are we going to do?" Danielle Pihik asked. "We cannot stay here and allow them to kill us."

"I said, slowly, "I don't know. Mme. Massie. There doesn't seem to be much that we can do except hope."

We lapsed into silence. There was nothing to say, nothing to do except sit there. I sat back by the light that I had seen. I realized that this was all out war with no quarter given or asked. The Algerians were indiscriminately killing French and even other white people in a hope that by bringing about enough terror they would force the French to give them independence. I had stumbled right into it because I had picked up a pretty girl in a late night club, something any man might do.

I knew for a fact that the Algerians were not torturing, and that they would kill us and let us be. They had to do it; there was no other way that they could prove to the French military authorities that their meant business and that their threats would be carried out.

It was very small comfort to know that when the Algerians responsible for the death of the lieutenant—and for our destiny—were caught, they would be executed. It wouldn't bring us back to life. But there seemed to be nothing at all that we could do to help ourselves. I took a quick check of Mademoiselle Pihik and Madame Charles to find out if they had any kind of weapons. They had nothing.

I was leaning up against the wall and Danielle Pihik was sitting up against my right shoulder with my right arm around and helping to support her. She was quiet, perhaps deep in thought. We did not move or say anything again until about an hour later when the light came on and an Algerian brought a bucket and the rag to the room. Another man, with a revolver in his hand, stood guard in the doorway while the first man placed the bucket in the room. He said, in Arabic, "Sleep."

When they left the light remained on. I was hungry and drank some of the watery soup although I was nauseated. A tasteless soup little more than drivel. Danielle and Sophie would not have any even though I told them that they should have some as it might help restore a little of their strength. Some time afterwards Danielle crawled to the bucket and drank two mouthfuls, but Sophie had none of it.

The hours were endless. Although the light was on in the room, we did not know whether it was night or day or what time it was. Danielle told me that she had come from the store at closing time and just as she began walking along the busy sidewalk, a car parked ahead of her began moving slowly. The car suddenly closed in on her, the door was flung open and she was hurtled into the car and sped off at high speed.

Danielle settled in my arms and made herself comfortable. I felt myself dozing off and did not fight it. My train was overtired and I reckoned that if time allowed and if I could catch a little sleep I might think of something when I awoke.

I was wakened, however, by Danielle shaking me. Quirke, I see, was lying curled up on the floor like a cat, asleep. "I have thoughts of something, Monsieur le Bresces," she said. "Can't we attack the men when they return? I could attack one and you another."

"I realize," I said, "I have thought of Quirke and I attacking them, but they'd kill us before—"

"You have not thought of me, Monsieur," the woman said. "They were watching you and that man all the time. They did not watch me."

There was much in what she said. "If we get killed," I said, "we haven't much to lose, have we? It only means dying a little sooner than we otherwise will. What do you think, Monsieur?"

"I am not bad looking," she said, and I looked at her dirty, smudged and blood-smeared face. "If I take off some of my clothes—to make a pillow—and clean my face, you see, Monsieur, can a man fail to look at a half-dressed woman?"

I smiled although God knows I felt far from smiling just then. "You are right, Monsieur," I said.

"Some of us here are trying to forget, Pierre!"

They would be attracted to her, I knew. I saw the possibilities. I called Quirke and told him roughly what we planned.

"No, no, no," the French bavarderess exclaimed. "No, I will not be killed by some crazy place. The soldiers are certain to look for us and to find us. We will be saved."

"Monsieur Quirke," Danielle said. "You do not know the rebels. You have not been here long. We will be dead and our heads delivered to the authorities long before the authorities will start looking for us. Oran is far. The French have many troubles here. Is it not better to die fighting than to die like a rat in a trap without putting up a fight?"

Quirke was silent for a few minutes, then said, tiredly, "What must I do?"

"Help Monsieur Le Bresces when he goes to work. Watch him and act only when he does," Danielle said.

She dissolved until she stood in a brazenes and pantie. She had a good figure, well filled and full, the kind of figure any woman would like to have. I took her stockings and dangled them in the way and then caressed her face.

When I was finished wiping all the smudges and blood from her face she looked another woman altogether, attractive and almost erotic. Right next to the door she laid her dress full length and folded her underclothes into a roll as a pillow, then she deliberately removed her brassiere and laid it neatly next to the pillow. She lay down on her back, stretched out, completely naked except for the pantie.

Then she said, looking at the high ceiling, "Monsieur, I have for the moment done my part. Let us hope that we can get away."

Another hour passed. My thoughts kept returning to the attractive and most desirable form of Danielle Pink. Yet there were more important things at the moment than love even though love is presumably a Frenchman's meat, bread and drink.

I was sitting on the floor against the wall on the other side of the door. The door was about two feet six inches wide and this was the only distance that separated Danielle from me. Quirke sat against

"I see your mother's come to visit us again!"

"You add my sweater and tight skirt distract you?"

the wall directly opposite the door. We were tense and keyed up as we waited for something to happen. I guess all three of us knew that our chances of successfully overpowering two or three guards were negligible, still we were willing to try. A man will do anything when facing certain death.

An electric tension hung in the air and reached explosive point as we heard the key rattle in the door. Then the lifting of the bar which apparently covered the door. Danielle looked at me and nodded. She did not smile, she raised her shoulders a fraction to make her bust more pendant, more appealing in their fullness. Quirin looked at me and sat with pinched face, pretending to be asleep, his eyes half closed but watching.

An Alberian moved into the room toward the bucket. I watched the other two on guard at the door. He had glared at me as they entered, now his eyes were flattening on Danielle. I could almost read his mind as he glistened over her white body. I saw him grow tense. I could feel the passion welling up in him. I drew at his feet. He caressed over the naked woman, the revolver flew from his hand, and Quirin simultaneously drew at the other man who had turned his back on Quirin's side to treat his eyes on the woman.

I laid my right arm under the man's chin, on his shoulder. I felt Danielle crawl down under us. I heard a crunching sound as more than dashed past my face and the Alberian grew limp in my arms. I saw a blurred movement as the woman struck the revolver down and smashed the skull of the man fighting with Quirin. It happened so fast that it would not be possible to give a blow by blow account.

I stood panting, next to me Quirin said hoarsely, "Let's go, quick." Danielle was slipping the dress over her head. I rummaged through the dead Alberian's pockets looking for another revolver, but found only a dagger which I gave to Quirin. "Remember," I whispered as we raced to the doorway, "you must kill or be killed. You cannot speak or make gestures. Kill anyone who gets in the way."

I checked the revolver. It had only four cartridges then I nodded at Danielle and Quirin and led the way up the narrow stairs which led straight down from somewhere above to the door of the basement.

A beam of light shot into the hole up which the steep staircase led. I saw above a square and assumed that the stairs led to a trapdoor. I was right. As I came almost with my head by the trapdoor I listened carefully but could hear nothing. Cautionally I peered my head over the top and saw that we were in a kitchen. At least, there was an old red stove, a washbasin and kitchen sink and cupboard but it did not seem as if the kitchen had been used for a long time. There was a window and door, but the door was closed.

As I got to the floor and waited for the others I heard the sound of voices beyond the door. I moved silently to the window. It was night time and dark outside. I could distinguish some kind of building which seemed to be about 20 to 30 feet behind the kitchen window.

I craned my neck to look down but could not see how far above the ground we were. I guessed though that we must be on the ground floor because of the basement and studied the window for a few seconds. It was fitting and had not been cleaned for years. There was a single catch which locked the upper and lower windows together. I tried it, but it was solid with grime and dirt. I motioned Quirin to give me the dagger and scraped carefully around the latch and then tapped it lightly until it began to move, then I gripped it solid with my thumb and forefinger.

There was running out, I knew. Someone might come from beyond the door at any second to find out why the two guards were taking so long collecting the bullet.

The window would not budge. I had not expected that it would and plopped into its frame with the dagger to free one of the points of glass so that I could get a grip in the frame to shove it upwards.

It began to bridge, but slowly with a loud cracking noise, then suddenly it shot upwards and cracked against the upper framework. I thrust Danielle into the window as I whirled to face the door, expecting someone to come charging through it. I did not see Quirin so had heard him whisper behind me, "Come, Monsieur!"

I was soaked with sweat, reluctant to turn my back on the door. As I swung my legs over the window sill the door opened. A man appeared in it. I caught a fleeting glimpse of his face, saw fear and shock on his steely Arab face. I squeezed the trigger and almost saw the bullet plough into his chest, then I dropped and fell as my feet struck some obstacles. I heard Danielle yell, "This way!"

I raced after the sound. From the window shade creased through the backyard, I tripped over some rubbish, jumped up and ran. In front of me I saw Quirin and in front of him Danielle. She had reached a wall and was scaling it. I dropped down the other side as bullets cracked into the wall. We hurried for a moment. The houses in which we stood ran two ways. Which way should we go? Quirin decided it by starting to run wearily. We followed. Behind us we heard groans and screams and sounds of men running. We could see nothing except the walls in the darkness. We might be running into a dead end to be trapped and shot down by the rebels.

Then Quirin burst into an open space, a large square-like place with buildings on the far side. I heard Danielle yell something and felt her grab my hand.

"Monsieur! Monsieur!" I heard her screaming after Quirin as he raced across the square away from us. She ran with me diagonally across the square just as some men burst into the square close behind us. In a moment we were lost in a mass of small alleys until we stepped onto a wide street. Far below, possibly a quarter of a mile away, we saw lights. We went on running until we ran into the arms of four commandos patrolling the streets.

Danielle exploded the story of our escape seconds after the commandos had ushered us into the nearest storage room of the gen-

"You ladies need a break?"

demique. Silence screamed as police and military vehicles roared in the general direction of the square and house from which we had escaped, but we could not tell the authorities where the house was.

We slept at police headquarters the rest of the night. The following morning we were escorted to Military Department headquarters where we revealed all that had happened. By then they already had the head of the soldier and our notes and I was asked to identify the head as being that of the man who had shared our green cell.

We were also dissected to say nothing of the occurrences until authorized by the Military Department. We were told that this was for reasons of security as any statements made by us might send the whole white population of Oran into a panic.

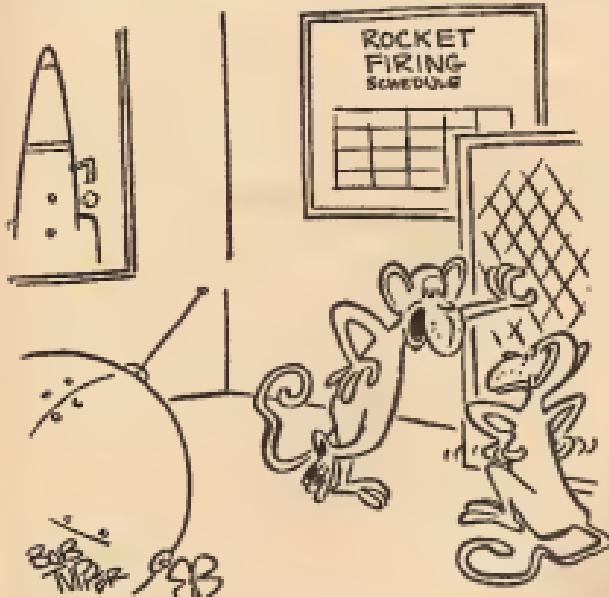

Every house and building in the approximate area of where we were held prisoner was searched by armed forces, but nothing was found, no sign of the house with the diagonal-lattice basement and no sign of the two Algerians whom we thought we had killed and for seven days no sign of Quirin. Then, one morning, eight days after our escape, a boxed parcel arrived at Military Headquarters and when it was opened by bomb disposal experts, the head of Quirin was found inside.

I received a clearance from the Oran military authorities the same day to leave for France or wherever I wished to go within French jurisdiction.

The girl, Wisanne, who had led me into the trap had disappeared. I went to see Danielle Thibaut just before I left for Tangier, where I work as a croupier in a night club and suggested that she should leave Oran. "Where shall I go?" she asked as we stood together.

"Why not Tangier?" I asked as I took her hand. "We have a lot of things to talk about and if you work in Tangier I will come and much time to talk about them." When I left for Tangier later in the evening the went with me.

"What do you say to a weekend on the moon, baby?"

"Your wife is on her way in, Sir!"

LET US OUT — THERE'S NO MORE AIR!

(Continued from page 22)

Penetrating the water with his nose, he noted what seemed to be a submerged tunnel. Was it possible? Yes, he remembered once having read about such things in a course he took at college. How did you reach them—could you get through? It was caused trying to "force a siphon". He remembered that, and also remembered reading about how many apothecaries were killed attempting to explore them. But if there was a way out of their trap, he had to find it.

"I'm drowning in, Wilson," he yelled up. "Give me more rope." Wilson fed the rope slack as Becker pulled it up over his head and dove into icy water. Fortunately, the tunnel wasn't too far from him or he might have blacked out from the freezing water. His brain seemed to go numb. He kept swimming until he was passing underwater through the narrow tube of rock—arms stretched out before him.

Nothing. He had swum 30 feet through the underwater tunnel only to come out at the other end. It was a pipe leading to nowhere. Once again there was no way out.

Becker swam back to where Wilson had the rope waiting and began the hazardous climb upwards with the difficulty of clearing the overhangs of rock formations.

Their only hope now lay at the cause of the problem—the cavern mouth.

By December 23 the men had cleared away most of the loose rubble near the entrance.

On January 4, 1945, they discovered the bad news. They came up against slabs of solid rock that had fallen across the entrance and sealed it tight. For days they chipped away at the stone barrier, but it was soon apparent that without dynamite the job was futile. They were trapped.

For a few weeks they kept up their spirits by believing that rescue operations would start from the outside. But they heard nothing. Discipline and co-operation vanished. Until then, Becker and Tanaka had been tolerant of their strenuous exertions; now all drew apart, suspicious and afraid. Becker and his two buddies formed one group; the two Japanese another; and the six girls a third.

"February 8. Serious trouble for the first time," wrote Becker in the diary. "Captain Itoh and Sergeant Tanaka, forming their attention on the girls. Delta Delgado, a cute Mexican of 14, in tears because Tanaka won't leave her alone. Almost got into fist fight with Tanaka, but Captain Itoh ordered the sergeant out of the smaller chamber. Both men nasty and only a matter of time before real trouble. Wilson and Cortino want immediate showdown, but I still have hope that the Japanese will show some sense in time."

Becker did what he could to keep everyone busy. He drew up plans for building a pool by damming up the underground stream. The water was too cold, but he even worked out a method for heating it. His enthusiasm was infectious. Wilson, Cortino and the girls all pitched in to get the project started.

On February 14 the trouble exploded. Becker, Wilson and Cortino were filling rocks together to form the sides of the pool when they heard a muffled scream from one of the chambers where the girls had set up their own private dormitory. Becker sprinted across the cavern.

Sergeant Tanaka, drooling salivae, had pinned Delta to the floor and was plucking kisses on her face and neck. Her blouse was ripped and hung from her waist; Delta was clawing at Tanaka's face. Her nails tore into his thick skin. He drew back his arm and slapped her hard.

Becker pulled the Japanese away and slammed him across the room. "Take!" Tanaka bellowed. "Take!" He crooked and snarled. He was a chunky man with bare shoulders and long muscular arms. His round head rested on a short thick neck. Great rolled down his chest. He jangled clamer, but he was agile, fast and powerful.

Becker side-stepped the charge, but Tanaka's shoulder hit him a glancing blow and sent him sprawling. Becker rolled over and jumped to his feet as Tanaka charged again. He darted, then met the charge squarely by driving his fist into the man's belly. The force of the blow knocked the wind out of Tanaka. He doubled over, gasping for breath. Becker moved in quickly. He forced him against the wall, then shifted his attack from the body to the hand to clutch Tanaka with a hard left hook and a powerful straight right. The blows smashed Tanaka's nose and blood dropped down his chin.

Becker worked over him with a cold, merciless rage and Tanaka's face turned red and puffy. The soldier tried to ward off the blows, but Becker brushed his arms aside. Tanaka finally fell forward on his face.

Becker picked up a smelly dog pall and dashed the scald contents over the unconscious sergeant. Tanaka shook his head and breathing nobly crawled to his feet.

"If I catch you in here again," Becker warned, "I'll kill you."

For the first time, Becker realized that they were not alone. Captain Kari had come in during the fight but had made no attempt to interfere or help his countrymen. Wilson, Carmen and the girls were watching him silently.

Captain Kari pushed Tanaka out of the room. At the entrance Kari paused. "Perhaps Tanaka San will kill you first, Becker?" Kari smiled and sauntered off.

For the next three weeks everyone fell into a morbid depression. Wilson and Cortina grew moody and sharp-tempered. The girls remained in their dorm, afraid to go anywhere alone. Tanaka and Kari huddled up in one of the side chambers and skilfully avoided the others.

One day Carmen took Becker aside. "It's impossible to go on living this way," she said. "If you try to keep the men away from us you will surely be killed. We have enough food to last us for years, so we must try to make some kind of normal life in here. The girls have decided that they will pair off with a man."

"Do we pull straws to choose partners?"

"Just a minute Fornsworth, I saw her first!"

Carmen smiled. "We have already chosen," she said. "Please call the men together."

Carmen's announcement that the girls would choose a man to live with brought a spontaneous cheer. Both Kari and Tanaka seemed pleased. They all shuffled about waiting for this deadly serious game to go on.

"The girls must be allowed to make the choice," she announced, "and you must promise to respect our decision."

Captain Kari drew himself up to attention and nodded his head briefly.

"Sacre Bleu," Cortina exclaimed. "Don't keep the bridgegrooms waiting."

Carmen called the roll. "Maria!"

Maria was part Chinese and Filipino. She was a bright big-boned girl and spoke Japanese quite well. She stepped out of the group and walked across the room. Lowering her eyes, she put her hand on Captain Kari's shoulder. He turned and laughed and patted out his chest proudly.

"Are you satisfied to take Maria?" Carmen asked.

"Huh!" he barked.

Aline, a tiny Miss with big, sad brown eyes, chose to live with Becker. Cortina, Beany, a youngster with a happy smile, put her hand to her mouth and stifled a nervous laugh, walked to Big Wilson's side. He took her hand. "Thanks, Beany," he murmured.

And then Carmen dropped her little bosom-shell. "Della, Mexican and perfect," she said quizzically, "have decided to live with Becker."

"Ahh!" Tanaka screamed. "What about me?" He lit home a stream of obscenities.

"Nobody wants you, Tanaka," Carmen said evenly.

Tanaka grabbed Kari by the jacket, demanding that one of the girls be forced to choose him. Kari brushed the scurvy's hands away. Tanaka's face turned into a mask of rage and hatred. He turned on his heel and, sobbing, fled.

"Carmen!" Becker barked. "Do you know what you've done? He won't accept living alone. You're beginning to trouble."

"...," she agreed, "but I cannot force anyone to live with that kind of scum."

The girls were very thorough. They had assigned the men different chambers. Becker was given

U.S. ARMY RECRUITING OFFICE

JOIN NOW

- TRAVEL
- ADVENTURE
- $200 PAY
- Bonus

"With a handsome fellow like you in camp I can see where they'll have to double the guard around the War's barracks."

"Aren't you forgetting the whistle, Corporal?"

the dorm, which Carmen promptly dubbed "Becker's Paradise". Carmen had discovered a bundle of padded jackets and the men had fixed up a cosy, if somewhat makeshift bed.

Becker kicked off his shoes and sat on the makeshift bed with his arms folded and his legs crossed.

"Do I look like your chief and master?" he asked.

Della, the baby of the crew, blushed. The 16-year-old Margarita hung her head and giggled.

"Huh!" Carmen laughed. "You look more like a man sitting on top of a volcano."

Still laughing, Carmen dived to the light bulb and twisted it back. He heard the girls chattering about and whispering. Suddenly he was bumped on to his back by a squirming pile of females. Having given up hope of rescue, they now lost all their inhibitions. And for the first time since he had been captured, Becker did not mind the clowns.

When Becker finally awoke, Della had her face buried in his shoulder. Margarita was sprawled across his chest. Carmen, having turned on the bulb, smiled at him. Running her hands over her bared thighs, she began to sway and turn in an erotic dance that she never learned in the girls' school in Davao.

Time lost all meaning. Becker almost forgot he was ungrasped and might possibly die there in the cave. To him, each minute was added Becker's Paradise. The girls whined on him as though he were, in fact, their chief and master.

For a week Becker saw Cortino and Wilson only for brief moments. Soon, however, all of them began to gather together in "Becker's Paradise" for dinner. They sat around swapping tales, dancing and helping to pass the time with their memories of times before the war.

Captain Ibari joined them from time to time, but rarely spoke. Most of the time he was a lone and lonely loyalist remained with him. Once she confided in Carmen that Ibari preferred her to remain apart from the other girls.

Sergeant Tanaka ate alone. He sat at about the same time like some wild beast. His beard grew strongly and his face and hands were covered with an accumulation of dirt. So long as the light was on, it didn't matter. But Becker, hoping to preserve their precious supply of paint and oil, suggested the generator be turned off six hours each day.

In the dark, Tanaka turned their paradise into hell. They couldn't see much, but they could hear his harsh breath and his soft, peddled footsteps. The peculiar animal noises he made sent shivers up their backs. And when they couldn't hear him they smelled the acrid sweat of his unclean body. Often they heard him lumbering away at a pile of ratty junk he'd found in the cave.

Naomi Cortino took it hardest. The slightest noise made him jump. Soon he refused to sleep when the lights were out. Instead, he sat in the darkness with a kitchen knife in his hands. Tanaka scared Cortino's fear and took special delight in tormenting the Filipino.

"He is crazy!" shouted Cortino to Becker. "Madam! Let us put this man out of his misery before he kills us all."

Becker tried to reason with Cortino, but nothing he said could bring the frightened Filipina to forget the Japanese sergeant.

"And what's he banging on that junk for?" Carmen demanded. "What is he up to?"

On July 14, 1945, Becker made the following entry in his diary:

"A strange, overwrought odor filled the cave this morning. We pushed in to investigate and found Sergeant Tanaka passing around in a stupor and carrying a Japanese song at the top of his voice. What a jerk! All these weeks Tanaka was building a still. We found it hidden behind a pile of empty cartons in his room—yards of copper coils and a mask made from rice and sugar. Tanaka couldn't wait for the whisky to distill and drink the stuff raw. Poor guy! Without a woman he has finally found his way to escape."

Cortino wasn't amused. He grabbed the mask and smacked the still. "There!" Cortino screamed. "Break our sugar, eh? You think we have sugar for this poison?"

Tanaka dropped on to the floor and wept. Suddenly he jumped to his feet. A look of intense hatred crossed his face, only to be replaced by a crazy, lip-smacking smile. He pointed his rifle at Cortino and then ran his finger across his throat.

"Huh!" he grunted. "For you."

Cortino went harrumphed and started the Japanese with both fists. Becker and Wilson pried him loose and as they dragged the Filipino away, Tanaka laughed—a deranged cackling laugh.

Becker awoke to Captain Ibari. "Talk to the guy. He'll listen to you. Do something or sure as hell there's going to be trouble."

Ibari snorted. "Trouble for you. No trouble for Captain Ibari!"

"A strange notion is budding up in this stone prison," Becker wrote in his diary on September 13. "Since Cortino destroyed Tanaka's still, the sergeant has stayed out of our way completely. It was bad enough while he was prowling around and menacing everyone. Now it is worse. We don't see or hear him. He moves around in the darkness like a cat. Everyone feels he is lurking on them. Cortino is after me every minute to kill the guy, but I will

IT MAY BE NEWS TO YOU

...but the Egyptians knew it ages ago!

POWERS to overcome sickness; Means to escape poverty! Knowledge to bring happiness and peace of mind! Skill and genius to create a civilization which we will copy to-day! These are only some of the accomplishments of the ancient Egyptians.

Above and beyond these physical achievements was the secret wisdom possessed by the Egyptian mystery schools. In these centres of learning men and women were taught the laws of life and how to master them. With this mastery they were able to shape their destinies as they wished them to be. It takes no greater mental effort to achieve results when you know how. Successful living is the oldest art in the world. It consists of developing initiative, foresight and the ability to combine experiences into new and workable ideas.

These laws operate as unfailingly as the laws which govern the sun, moon and planets. They were discovered centuries ago by certain wise men in Egypt, and preserved down through the ages by the Rosicrucians.

The Rosicrucians

(AMORC)

Box 1912, G.P.O., Sydney

Time has since crumbled Egypt's walls, but it couldn't destroy this formula for the control of life. In your hands, this knowledge could alter the entire course of your affairs.

The Rosicrucians offer to you—if you have the courage to break away from limited forms of thinking—these same simply expressed truths of life which have led thousands to a joyous method of better living.

LET THIS FREE BOOK HELP YOU

Learn how you may share the private instructions of The Rosicrucians, a non-profit fraternity of men and women whose influence extends into every land. Let this be the turning point in your life! For your copy of "The Mastery of Life" use the coupon below or write to Scribe A.R.D.

The Rosicrucians (AMORC)
Box 1912, G.P.O., Sydney

Please send me, without obligation, my copy of "The Mastery of Life" which explains how I may increase and set your thoughts and spirit aright for obtaining membership of the.

Name _____

Address _____

refuse. He's a human being—mad, silly, brutal, but still human. I can't appear before Judge, jury and executioner. Until last week Wilson supported me. Now even Wilson and the parks are beginning to side with Cortino. I don't know where it will end.

Cortino was like a man possessed—constantly狂妄 and almost afraid to sleep. He lost weight rapidly. He jumped at the slightest sound. He was either screaming at Alma or hollering for air. He developed a nervous tick that twitched the side of his face and he was constantly on the edge of exhaustion.

Sergeant Tanaka, using several shovels, seemed to be playing with Cortino. On the night of October 1, Cortino dropped into an exhausted sleep, unable to keep up his hopeless vigil. On that night Tanaka struck. When Becker went into Cortino's room the next morning, to get him to join in the hunt for the pool, he stopped in horrified shock. Cortino and Alma were sprawled in each other's arms, but their faces were gone—smashed into a horrible pulp by some blunt club.

In the dorm Becker told Wilson that Tanaka had to die. It would be an execution of necessity. And it would be a legal retaliation. In this time society of theirs, Tanaka was a threat to the life that was still allotted to them. There was only one punishment for a murderer—death. The girls agreed, and when Captain Ward was informed of their verdict, he merely shrugged as though the matter were no concern of his.

"You girls stay here in the dorm together," Becker said.

He and Wilson found two heavy crowbars and began their search. They covered every inch of the cave, but Tanaka could not be found. They retraced their steps. They set up blocks in the passageways, but Tanaka was gone.

"Okay," said Becker. "The guy didn't go up in smoke. We'll post a 24-hour guard over the feed supply. When he's hungry enough he'll come crawling out of his crack."

Their kept the lights on at all times. Becker and Wilson took turns at guard around the clock. A week passed without any sign of Tanaka. The girls were close to hysteria. They wept and cuddled in their dorm together. Little things set them off and they began to quarrel bitterly.

"Mind you brush your hair all day long and all night, too!" Denee screamed at Wilson, who had a habit of running his fingers through his thinning, sandy hair. "Breaking your hair won't make it grow."

Wilson flushed and jammed his fist into his pocket. Carmen, Delta and Margaret worked on each other's nerves, too. Weeks before they had been co-operative and friendly to each other, now they were torn by jealousies. Each girl was resentful of any attention that Becker gave to one or the other of them.

Captain Ward did nothing to soothe their nerves. He and Maria moved about the camp freely. He treated her with great concern and pined her with affection and consideration. She blushed, and they laughed together a great deal.

"It's them," Carmen whispered to Becker. "They're hiding Tanaka."

"I searched their room," said Becker.

"Well, search it again," Carmen screamed.

Thereupon, Becker marched into Denee's chamber. He searched the passageway that led into the main vented chamber, but Tanaka wasn't there. Nor was there the tell-tale odor of his body.

"Carmen! Delta! Maria! Come down here!" Denee said with a sarcastic grin.

Becker frowned. Maria glared and translated. "The Captain says for you not to be so nervous."

Becker scolded. And he couldn't resist getting back at them in some way. It was a petty, spiteful trick, but he blurted out: "Not for yourself, Maria, dear, but Carmen thinks Tanaka might take it into his head to take you for his woman."

The girls paled. She hadn't dreamed of that possibility. The sand took root firmly and Maria began to tremble and nod at Becker. For a time the Captain was content to mock and dominate the girl, but his patience wore thin and soon he was slapping her around.

"Please," Carmen begged Becker, "don't let that dirty dog hurt up Maria."

"She chose him. It's their affair," he said sharply, driving another wedge between them.

Once Maria rushed into their dorm and begged them to let her stay with them. Her face was swollen and her eyes red from weeping.

Captain Ward stamped in after her and shouted. "She's our woman! Don't get in my way!"

He dug his fingers in her hair and dragged her back to their quarters. Becker heard him beat her unmercifully. Carmen begged him again to stop, but Becker refused.

"She dug her own grave. Let her lie in it," he said with a creaking that sounded shocking even to his own ears.

LAUGHS AND LAUGHS AND LAUGHS AND
LAUGHS AND

LAUGHS and LOVELIES

LOVELIES LAU
LOVELIES LAU
LOVELIES LAU
LOVELIES LAU

A hundred laughs and a score of beautiful girls — that's the mainplaining content of a brand new magazine, LAUGHS and LOVELIES. Sophisticated humor in drawing and word and a sparkling array of feminine charms make LAUGHS and LOVELIES the perfect book to relax with!

LAUGHS and LOVELIES

Look for the cover at your bookstall or newsagent — price 2/-.

LAUGHS AND LAUGHS AND LAUGHS AND LAUGHS AND LAUGHS AND LAUGHS AND
LAUGHS AND

LOVELIES LAU
LOVELIES LAU
LOVELIES LAU
LOVELIES LAU
LOVELIES LAU
LOVELIES LAU
LOVELIES LAU

The girls kept after him, until he finally said, "If we do this thing we'll turn him into another Tanaka and we'll have two wild beasts on our hands."

"Then warn him to stop beating her!" Carmen demanded.

"Okay."

Becker delivered the ultimatum, and to his surprise Hora accepted the warning calmly. He appeared almost serene.

On the sixteenth day after the murder of Cortina and Alma, the lights suddenly went out throughout the cavern. Becker's throat tightened. His heart pounded wildly. After so many days of constant fear they had almost forgotten the meaning of total blackness. It enveloped them with fear. The darkness was silent. Then they heard Tanaka's wild laughter echo through the cave. Somewhere in the darkness the madman was lying in wait for them.

"He's stopped the generator," said Wilson. "He's waiting for us to come out there."

Carmen threw her arms around Becker. "Don't go," she begged. "Let them turn on the generator."

Wilson jumped to his feet. "I'll go. I've got to do something or else I'll b— well as mad myself."

Without waiting for an answer he ploughed toward the generator, stumbling in the darkness. He moved farther and soon all was silent. Suddenly a terrible scream pierced the air. Becker ran toward the cry, stumbling against the walls and over the rough projections in the floor. Moving past the main vaulted chamber, he crept his way into the generator room. He heard the men scuffling and their heavy breathing.

Becker slipped past the struggling figures. In the darkness he groped toward the generator and found it at last. He snapped on the switch, but the generator didn't go on. He moved his hand along the side of the machine and then discovered the cable had been disconnected. His hand shook as he turned it into the socket. The motor revved into action and slowly the lights went on.

With an inhuman roar, Tanaka picked up Wilson and hurled him against the padded stone wall. The dull thud echoed through the chamber. Wilson dropped to the ground and lay still.

Tanaka bent to one knee and picked up a crowbar. He moved it on Becker and then with a grimace among the hooked end at Becker's head. Becker ducked and beat the man back. Whistle past his ear, Becker shuffled back out of range.

Carmen suddenly ran up behind him and thrust a kitchen knife into his hand. Becker gripped it and began to circle the big Japanese. Tanaka closed again, stabbing out with the crowbar. Becker didn't move fast enough and the hook sprang a jagged wound across his chest.

Becker circled and retreated and Tanaka grew angrier and bolder.

Becker moved like a boxer, then suddenly lunging toward Tanaka he drew a hard blow. The iron bar caught him across the arm and burned like a blow torch. But before Tanaka could recover his balance and bring the bar back for another blow, Becker lunged forward and stuck the knife to the ribs of the Japanese sergeant's chest.

Surprise crossed Tanaka's face. He clutched the blade and tried to pull it loose, but his fingers had lost their strength. The madness passed from his eyes. He looked almost grateful. With a weary sigh he fell forward.

Becker picked up Wilson, but the Amico was dead. His right ear had been torn off in the fight and a terrible hole had been dug into his belly by the crowbar. Despite these blows, Wilson had fought on doggedly.

When Becker was finally able to compose himself, he went into Captain Hora's chamber and asked the Japanese to help him bury the dead.

Hora nodded. Together they carried the bodies toward the tunnel entrance and buried them under the rubble next to the crude graves of Cortina and Alma.

Weeks later, Becker discovered Tanaka's hiding place. At the end of one tunnel he had removed a large boulder. Beyond the boulder was a small room about four feet square. A pile of cans and tins were heaped inside. Tanaka had been building up supplies even before he killed Cortina and Alma.

The girls did their best to make Becker forget the horrible memory of the fight and Wilson's death. Dennis joined the others in "Becker's Paradise" and the girls went out of their way to be pleasant to her. Even Captain Hora began acting secretly and treated Becker with respect. Becker accepted the change in the Japanese, but deep down he knew that Hora would never forgive him for taking over unofficial command.

Becker took up the work on the pool and on December 13, 1945, one year after they were trapped in the cave, the pool was finished. Becker had devised a heating system that kept the water at an even temperature.

A MUST FOR ALL

SPORT

SPORTSMEN MAGAZINE

Here for the first time is an authoritative, exciting magazine which satisfies Australians' thirst for bright, cheering sports stories, a magazine which prints the sports you cannot read in newspapers.

DON'T MISS THESE BIG FEATURES IN SPORT

[Famous Australian Keith Miller, renowned for his brilliant comments, is one of the growing band of avid SPORT readers.]

SPECTACULAR PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE WORLD'S SPORTS STARS IN ACTION.

THE MOST COMPREHENSIVE COVERAGE EVER DEVOTED TO OUR AMATEUR SPORTS.

THE NATION'S MOST TALENTED TEAM OF SPORTS COLUMNISTS, WRITERS.

SPECIAL NORTHERN (RUGBY LEAGUE) AND SOUTHERN (AUSTRALIAN RULES) FOOTBALL EDITIONS.

EVERY MONTH,
2/6 AT ALL
NEWSAGENTS

SPORT MAGAZINE

ture of 72 degrees. The girls loved it.

On that day Becker made the following entry in his diary: "The pool is a godsend. I think it has washed away the blood of the men I killed. The girls spend hours frolicking in the water. They have never been more delightful. They reward me of souls."

During the weeks Becker had worked alone on the pool, the girls also had been busy. They had rebuilt Tanaka's stilts.

"For whatever time we have," said Carmen, "it's against every pleasure from life that we can."

Becker smiled happily. "Why in hell not!"

Finally one who added a new dimension to their lives. Carmen invented childhood names to amuse Becker. Once she switched off the lights and made him identify her voice by touching only their noses. Another time he had to guess their identity by kissing their toes. And so it went.

On January 16, 1944, Becker made this entry in his diary:

"Captain Dean has begun to mistreat Maria again. The girls beg me to put a stop to it. I can't stand her screams, but then if I interfere I know I'll have to kill Dean. He's not the kind of man to set an impulse like breaking up of Maria is calculated. He wants me to threaten him, I believe. But why?"

Becker waited two weeks and learned the answer. A terrible explosion shattered the silence. Becker raced into Dean's room and found himself looking into the barrel of a 45 automatic.

"Are you surprised to see the gun?" Dean gloated, then pointed the muzzle toward the wall and aimed it at a small target he had drawn. The target had one jagged hole through the bull's eye. Dean squeezed the trigger and the gun went off with a roar. When the smoke cleared, Becker turned and saw that another jagged hole was born in the bull's eye.

"The third shot is for you, Master Becker."

Becker had often wondered what he might do up this kind of situation. Would he beg for his life? Now he knew. If Dean wanted to kill him in cold blood, Becker wouldn't have his hand to plead for mercy. He waited for Dean's blow.

For the first time since they'd been buried alive Captain Dean held the upper hand and savored the situation. He glared and snarled. "You broke the guns and I, Captain Dean, put the standard back together. We Japanese know how to make the best of any situation. How to create."

The girls came into the room and flung themselves in front of Dean, weeping. He kicked them out of the way.

With a triumphant smile, Dean raised the gun, and pointing it between Becker's eyes, pulled the trigger. The hammer clicked. There was no explosion. Dean pulled the trigger again and again and then with an oath, flung it at Becker. The first two shots had jarred loose the hammerless firing pin. Captain, it wasn't hitting the cartridge properly.

Becker pulled back his fist and then midway in air he stopped. "Be, you're the new Japanese superman!"

Becker threw back his head and laughed. Soon the girls joined in and they kept laughing until tears streamed from their eyes.

"I'm not going to kill you, Dean," Becker said finally. "You can wander about the cage like your friend Tanaka and contemplate the stories of the Emperor. Maria, leave him alone."

Two days later Becker drove a sharp stick into his belly and died alone.

Becker still continued to explore and comb every inch of the cave. He kept discovering new wonders inside their tomb. He found a lava bed and coral formations. At one point he witnessed a phenomenon—in one of the tunnels there was a large hole and roots of sort were sacked up into it. At first Becker thought the hole could provide a possible means of escape, but after many attempts at hammering and chiseling it he knew once more that escape was impossible. The air being sucked up simply died away.

Becker stopped making entries in his diary. Then on March 28, 1944, 482 days after they were buried by the bandits, Becker heard a dull hammering at the mouth of the cave. He thought it was his imagination, but the noise continued. Three days later an operator was dynamited from the outside. The girls crawled out and Becker took a last look at the cavern before following.

The Filipino workers stared incredulously as the girls and Becker emerged from the sealed vault.

The war was over and the Filipinos facing a shortage of food, had broken into the cave for the Japanese supplies.

The bodies of those who had died in the cave were hauled out and buried.

Becker and the girls refused to talk about their experiences and soon the story was forgotten. Becker returned to the States and six months later was persuaded to open his diary for this publication. *

SILENT TIGER

(Continued from page 38)

All at once I wanted to see it over . . . and I thought it was when Gant went down.

But his fingers closed into the soft steel, and he rose to his feet. He fell into a crouch, crimping Gant's arms, holding on till his hand slipped.

Gant tried to shove him off, but Gant still clung, shaking drops of blood from his lacquered face down Gant's chest.

My breathing was better now, although my hands still hurt, I leaned against the jolt post.

Gant buried his head under Gant's chin, and let the ex-serviceman. The hand held split Gant's chin and threw his backward. Gant, now somewhat recovered, leaped him with left and right, heavy punches that showed Gant still had some fight.

Gant ducked under another one and came into Gant, switching his weight to Gant's body. His left buried itself almost to the wrist in Gant's midriff with a sudden, sudden thump, and his right came up in a short one under Gant's heart.

This was the newest, punishing "Fatty" Magese now, the man who'd climbed into the ranks of Australia's top-flight boxers in '31 and '34—the man who'd half-killed young Harlow that night in Rushcutters Bay.

Gant paled under Gant's punishment, and reeled away, but didn't go down. Gant followed him, driving pulp under flesh and ribs. Gant was still on his feet . . . and I knew then with a clear certainty that Gant was not trying to knock him out.

I moved across to Gant's sidebars, grabbing the arm of the man nearest to me.

"Stop him!" I said in a harsh voice. "Can't you see he's fighting to kill?"

They stood there, as if all this couldn't happen to Joe Gant, the best man on the coast.

I moved forward quickly and the pain in my belly came again and doubled me up. By an effort of will I reached Gant and arm-harvested him across the throat from behind.

He was hard to hold . . . and I got on the pressure. He grappled, cracked . . . tried to turn over on me.

And then the other two came across at last, pinning Gant's arms to his sides. Then he stopped struggling . . . and was still. All at once he seemed to come back from a dream world.

Gant sat at his feet. Gant frowned and peered down at him.

There was an eerie hush, and when Gant spoke it seemed as loud as a clash of gongs.

"Now you know, Jim," he said. "Now you know the story of 'Fatty' Magee, and his sudden retirement from the ring. Don't ask me to explain it."

He was himself again now, and he bent over the heavily breathing form of Joe Gant, laying there at his feet.

"We're bastards" to come round. Gant'll be okay now. Thanks for stoppin' me."

He stood up again—and then Venida Tremaine was there in front of him. Wordlessly, she reached up and pulled his pulp down to her and slowly dug his mouth, still bleeding from Gant's cuts.

Her lips deviated deep . . .

Gant looked at her without speaking. The back of his hand wiped the bus from his mouth and flicked across the stinging cuts on his face. He turned and walked quickly away across the salt flat.

All at once he looked terribly alone. *

THE COMEBACK

(Continued from page 4)

"Yes, Fay was born there. I moved to the mainland after my mother died . . . more than 20 years ago now. Fay doesn't remember her mother."

I didn't push it. I swung the questions back to Lambert then, but I was watching Laren. He had his eye on me. I saw his lips move soundlessly around my name and suddenly his body was stiff, face bloodless, the skin livid on his neck.

"Dad, what's wrong? You look ill!"

"I'm — okay, girl. We were students once. Know me, Mr. Marlowe. I have an idea that goes off occasionally . . . I've got a mixture in the kitchen . . ."

"I'll get it, dad . . . No, you sit down, Fay. I'll get it myself."

"We all settled about tomorrow then, Mr. Laren? I mean my meeting on the trolley with you . . ."

"Well, I don't know. I wouldn't like to be held responsible if anything happened to you."

"You won't be, I can guarantee that."

"I thought you'd already agreed to take Mr. Marlowe along, dad."

"Well, I've been thinking since then, little, and . . ."

"Hick, Vera," Lambert put in quietly. "The publicity'll do us good."

"And my Marlowe says his paper will pay, dad," Fay smiled.

Laren sighed. "All right. Be at the wharf at 8 am sharp. If you're not there we won't wait, I've got to catch the tide."

"I'll be there," I promised as he left the room. I turned back to Lambert. "I heard you dislocated your knee in the rapids."

"That's right, I did."

"I don't see any sign of a limp."

"No, Vera clicked it back into place Marlowe with his hands, that man. The whole foot comes to him with their cuts and bruises and breaks. Vera fixes them all."

"The folks about here say he's as good as a doctor," Fay told me proudly. "But he's modest about his healing touch. Doesn't tell anyone to mention it. So, please, don't include it in your article, Mr. Marlowe."

I forced a grin that felt pretty tight around the edges. I was beginning to shake a little now. I had the sweep of the year almost within my grasp.

Almost . . .

I was surprised to find Lambert on the trolley with Laren and Fay when I walked out to the wharf at 8 am sharp. He stepped as he helped me aboard and Fay smiled hello, Laren nodded curtly.

I felt as tight as a shock-primer. I'd been up most of the night at the phone, checking details of the British case with the paper's big clerks. I needed a drink now to set me up but I knew one would be too many, 100 not enough.

"I thought you'd be supervising the repairs on your own trolley,

GET A NEW BODY!

QUICKLY — EASILY — SECRETLY

FREE BOOK shows You How Simple It Is!

A simple secret that gives any normal-weighted man or woman a new body — a body that looks and feels like a 20-year-old. And it's so simple that you can do it in your spare time — even while you're working, shopping, and you can do it without losing weight — even if you're overweight. Just send us the coupon below and we'll send you our FREE SAMPLE book and postpaid FREE BOOK and a free copy of

— COUPON —

DON ARNALDO, Box 1118, G.P.O., SYDNEY.

Send my name and address to DON ARNALDO, Box 1118, G.P.O.,
SYDNEY. Send me the FREE SAMPLE book and the FREE BOOK.

MEN NU-MAN BUILDS HE-MEN TRY IT FREE

And learn the Secret of new Vigour and Vitality

Now, with this genuine FREE SAMPLE offer you can prove to yourself, as so many thousands of other Australian men have done, that from the day you start NU-MAN you begin to grow. With NU-MAN you'll feel stronger, more masculine, more able to cope with life's everyday problems. You'll get back missing vitality and vigor — feel years younger. Send this out now . . . send with your name and address today for your

FREE SAMPLE of NU-MAN

It comes by return mail in plain wrapper without obligation.

A. B. WARD & CO.

DEPT. MAIL, BOX 1118, G.P.O., SYDNEY.

NOW! BIRTH REGULATION

the NATURAL WAY

At last, a SAFE, NATURAL, RUGGED method

Approved by Church Groups and Doctors

• ONLY 1/6 - COMPLETE

NO RISKS

Now is the ideal opportunity and opportunity for every man that every woman deserves. An easy, comfortable procedure to satisfy wives and husbands for family spacing. NU-MAN is a natural birth control. It is safe, effective, and reliable. Even the only a few cases where sterilization has been, and even the vaginally delivered, have been successful. There is no physical damage to either the man or the woman.

LASTS A LIFETIME

Don't delay. Write to us, enclosing postage and address, and a stamp of 10 cents U.S.A. and 15 cents Canada and Mexico. We will send you complete information and answer all your questions.

MODERN WAY TO FAMILY PLANNING

NU-MAN creates a rugged method of birth regulation preferred by doctors and couples that consider the joy of great children. When you want them, you complete freedom from worry of birth control.

FREE! FULL DETAILS ON REQUEST

Send TODAY. Your copy goes with your name and address. Please enclose 10 cents U.S.A. and 15 cents Canada and Mexico postage. Address: Dr. Edward F. Ward, Dept. Mail, Box 1118, G.P.O., Sydney, Australia. Complete information will be furnished by return mail in plain wrapper.

Vigilante Laboratories
Department, B.A.T.
Box 1118, G.P.O., Sydney.

Don't be lonely

Find happiness through our Personal Friendship Club. Select and enter beloved Write today. No obligation.
DOROTHY POPE, Sales A.M.C., Box 122, Burwood P.O., SYDNEY.

WIN LOTTERIES, RAFFLES, WORKSHOPS, ETC.

For all the lucky lottery, wonderful presents selected and delivered. Write to our office
Please send 10 stamps for postage.

The Lucky Guy Dept. A208
SHARE THE LUCK CLUB (Regd)

Box 122, Burwood P.O., Sydney
Post Office Suburb, NSW 2105
For the unusual chance of having your name in the draw — and more!

SEND NO MONEY!

Lambert:

"It'll take a fortnight," he said, eyes somehow bright with excitement. "Pay was excited, too, over something. She couldn't hold it in any longer. She smiled at me and said, 'probably.'

"She does competitive swimming in her spare time. He's won a lot of trophies. Now he's been chosen for the State team to compete in the Australian championships in Sydney next week. He only found out last night. He'll have to fly down tomorrow night so he can get out on the trailer today to have as much time with me as possible."

"Nice rooms, young fella."

"If we win, I stand a chance of making the next Empire Games," he said enthusiastically.

Larsen killed the motor long life and we moved slowly out into the river. I sat out of the way on a pile of mats, watching Pay and Lambert move about the deck. We crawled across the seaway, past the black ridge, running for the white line of thunder that marked the bar. I watched Larsen's hands on the wheel.

Was it possible that those thick, liss-armed fingers had once held a surgeon's scalpel — or a blasting pistol? I had my first doubts of doubt as I watched him deftly manipulate the wheel and the throttle. He did it so effortlessly that it was hard to imagine that this man had been born to any other life than that of a trawlerman ... We scraped over the bar with a bit of a bump. That was all.

"No sensations going out, anyway," I said to Pay.

"Going out always the easiest — it's the return that's tricky, with the waves breaking sideways."

It was noon before we reached the trawling grounds. Most of the time, Larsen and I had been alone in the cockpit. We'd hardly spoken a dozen words. But if I made him uneasy, he didn't show it ...

Pay and Lambert began working the nets up to the rollers. Larsen moved around me as if I wasn't there.

"You wouldn't know Perth Name days, Doc," I said quietly.

He turned cold steel onto me, not saying anything. "I was there last year. They've turned that beach house of Captain's into flats now."

"I don't know what you're talking about, Mr. Marlowe," he said very slowly, very distinctly, "I've never been to Perth in my life."

I laughed. "Of course not. You were never a doctor, either."

"Are you crazy, Marlowe?" But he was careful to keep his voice down so it wouldn't reach Pay or Lambert. "I'm a fisherman — maybe I'm too damn simple or the damn' dumb to understand you."

Lambert railed for the boom. Pay called for more space. Larsen worked at the levers automatically.

"Trout!" Larsen yelled suddenly and Larsen cut in the screw. We moved slowly through the swirl, jerking a little with the drag of the net.

I suddenly wanted to hurt this man who had killed my father. I hadn't started out with any thoughts of revenge but if I could give Larsen a little hell, then why not? It might raise him up and give me proof that he was really Ericson.

"Maybe Pay or Lambert will understand me better."

"I don't know what you're up to, Marlowe, but I don't like your tone. If you're accusing me of something, spit it out. Or shut up."

"I did some checking last night, Stuart Ericson's daughter was named Pay. That both disappeared a couple of months before you showed up here. Coincidence, eh, doc?"

"You're a sick man, Marlowe," he said, calmly enough, though his mouth was pulled a little tight. "Sick or crazy, or both."

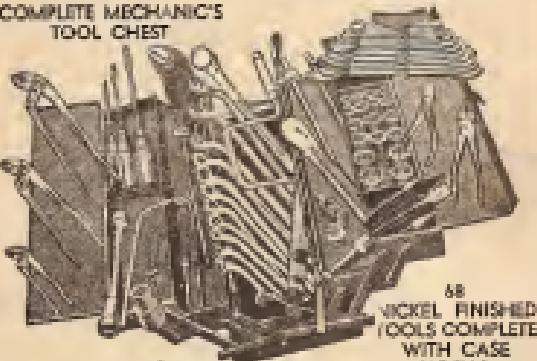

"Ahh, come off it, Ericson! Admit it: I've got you dead to rights! Your names isn't Vera Larsen it's . . ."

"Let go my arm, Marlowe!"

I hit him. I was all worked up and his attitude grated on my raw nerves. The wheel spun as he fell back. Pay screamed. Lambert kept down into the cockpit. Larsen pushed

DO IT YOURSELF

COMPLETE MECHANIC'S TOOL CHEST

68
NICKEL FINISHED
TOOLS COMPLETE WITH CASE
£37.10/-

Send coupon below
for full details and terms.

This set comprises 68 precision built, nickel finished tools in a folding metal Tool Box which opens in tiers to give easy access to all sections.
SEND NOW!

At last — a superb new complete outfit for the professional mechanic as well as the "do-it-yourself" man.

These 1st quality tools are of German manufacture and contain both S.A.E. and Whitworth open-end, ring and socket spanners.

They can be yours for a low deposit and 12 monthly instalments, but send now, there are only a limited number available.

HAMPSON'S ENTERPRISES PTY. LTD.
411 East St., Box 4184 G.P.O., SYDNEY.
(Just behind the Town Hall if you care to call and inspect.)
1 enclose stamp for further details of the Mechanic's Tool Chest.
NAME: _____	ADDRESS: _____

P.S.

ed to his feet, stood at his mouth, his rescue-chary fishing-knife in his hand.

"Great Marlowe, Jim! You're mad!"

I turned for his throat. Lambert pointed me in the head. I rolled into a corner and they crowded me back, Larson with the knife held threateningly, though he made no attempt to use it on me. I kicked at Lambert's knee, and he fell against Larson. I jumped forward, fist flying . . .

A moment later Lambert screamed and fell back, hand clutched at the gaping wound above the elbow of his right arm, blood jetting in a thick, bright stream. The fingers of his right hand were hooked like steel talons. Blood was spurting all round the cockpit and I knew an artery had been severed. Larson was on his knees, face over, moaning. Fay ran to him. Larson glared dizzily at the reddened blade he held. I shouldered him aside, pushed Fay out of the way and jammed my thumb on the pressure-point high in Lambert's temple. He passed out, falling against me.

"Get a surgeon around his open arm, quick!" I snapped at Fay. "Get my belt!"

As she worked with trembling fingers she breathed, "Oh, my God! What — what are we going to do?"

"Whatever it is, we better do it damn quick!" Then I suddenly realized I had the means of proving my suspicion correct once and for all. "Larson! Snap out of it, man! We had to do enough research for medical articles in my day to know you've severed the brachial artery in Lambert's arm. If it isn't regrafted almost immediately he can bleed to death . . . a surgeon's not enough. The artery's got to be stitched!"

Larson seemed to come out of it then. He gave me a murderous look that still had a lot of sadness in it as he knelt beside us. His hand shook as he looked at the wound. I saw sweat bead his brows.

"I — I can't do anything. This needs a surgeon . . ."

"Come on, Larson, you don't have much time to decide. Even if he doesn't bleed to death before we get him ashore, he'll be finished as a swimmer unless that artery's repaired . . ."

"Oh, no!" Fay whispered in horror. "Dad, dad, can you do anything? You're good at First Aid. Please, dad, try! For God's sake try!"

Larson looked sick. His lower lip was trembling. He stared down at his shaking bloodstained hands.

"Look at the way his hands clawed!" I snarled, sweating, turned stomach twisted, wanting to scream at him. "I remember reading something about that . . ."

"It means the ulnar nerve is damaged," Larson said hoarsely in a weary voice and I knew I had him then. "It's a characteristic paralysis, the terminal points of the phalanges flexed the flat, making the hand like a willow . . . There's nothing I can do about that out here. Hell have to go to hospital. But I'll see about the artery . . ."

Crime consciousness now have their own BOOK CLUB to seek out and protect crime novels and thrillers.

From the hundreds of books submitted, the crime experts select one book each month which is published in the Club's exclusive edition for members only. They are unabbreviated, well printed and bound in HARDB COVERS (not "paper-backs") — quite the equal of the expensive editions — yet they cost less than half the usual price. They are truly books for your collection.

JOIN TODAY and make sure of your favorite reading. Club releases will include:

* SPIES DIG AT DAWN

By MAXWELL MORRISON — A suspenseful espionage thriller with a double agent, double-crossing, double-spies to an extent with such a variety of plots that you'll never guess who's who or what's what in a Masterful tale.

* OUT OF THIS WORLD

By MARION CLEARY — An exciting science-fiction story in which the author, a meteorologist, writes of the perils of space travel. The author's previous books won the Mystery Writers of America's Grand Prix of Mystery, the Mystery Writers of America's Mystery Award, and the Mystery Writers of America's Mystery Book of the Year.

* THE LONGEST SECOND

By W. F. HALLINGER — An amateur detective who solves every kind of crime. This popular author has now written fifteen books in the series, all of them gripping, suspenseful stories of his search for his secret.

----- HOW TO JOIN -----

To THE MYSTERY BOOK GUILD
142 Clarence Street, SYDNEY.

I ENROLL HERE AND NOW!

I will join the Mystery Book Guild, except at least Six monthly books and thereafter give one monthly notice if I wish to resign.

I will pay $1.00, including postage, on receipt of each book.
 Enclosed is $1.00 for my books.

Please use BLOCK letters

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

TOWN _____ STATE _____

SIGNATURE _____

I didn't feel any pain right then. There was the need to do as Larsen began snapping orders to the pained, frightened girl and me. The rest is just a blur. I remember lots of hot water, skin ripples, the reefs rocking the cruiser and Larsen swearing obscenely, fingers slippery with blood as he used a hair-thin nylon fishing line and a sewing needle to make up the severed artery with. A world of time he sat back and said he couldn't go on. But he continued until the lips of the wound had been sewn together, and bandaged tightly. Then he pinched the stiffened hand and set back with a sigh, face almost as bloodless as the unconscious Lambert's.

Hours had passed. It seemed. The sun was falling into the sea in the west. Now that it was all over, Fay had a reaction and faltered. We put her in the bunk above the one that held Lambert. On deck again, Larsen cut his nails, puffed the motor and headed back for the mainland at full throttle.

"Now work, Doctor Ericson," I said quietly, listening to his scratches and giving him one.

After a long time he said, "Why do you fellows have to rule over the mock in a man's past, Marlowe? Why can't you leave people alone? Fay knows nothing about the Paris affair. She doesn't remember any other Ute than the one I've told her. And she's a good girl. She's happy here and shall marry Jim Lambert with my blessing. Or she would have. God alone knows what'll happen when you print that story about the notorious Doctor Ericson, finally located after 20 years, posing as a fisherman. . . . What is it you want, Marlowe? Because I've paid many times over for what I did! A man can make his own hell if he listens to his conscience..."

"No, I didn't start out for revenge, Larsen. I needed a big story, a scoop, to make a comeback. I had a little trouble and developed a taste for houses. It just about satisfied me as a thrill. But when I break this story about you, I'll be right back at the top. It's kind of fitting that my father's murderer should help me get there."

We were cutting through the water fast, the low-wave crashing and hissing. Larsen went below to look at Lambert and see how Fay was when he came out on deck again he lit the riding lights. It was dark now and the glow of the mainland was only a few miles off.

"Lambert's all right. I had another look at his hand. The nerve still seems to be damaged beyond repair. Fay's drifted into an exhausted sleep. So that leaves just you and me, Marlowe."

I turned, watching him warily.

"You could disappear over the side and no one would know the difference. We've got rum and brandy aboard. I could say you took a drink to steady your nerves after we'd fixed Lambert's arm. It was enough to set you off. You kept hitting it, stumbled overalls in the dark. You'd gone by the time I got the boat running around."

I turned back, ready to jump him if he came at me.

"It wouldn't make any difference, of course," he went on. "I'm afraid I made too professional a job of Jim's arm, even if I did have to improvise. It will start all kinds of questions. You can't learn those things from a book; you have to sweat and learn in an operating theatre. There's no way I could explain it satisfactorily without admitting I was a surgeon years ago."

Wonderful how knowledge a man thinks he's forgotten returns to a doctor in an emergency . . .

No, you see, Marlowe, whether or not that story gets printed, the story will come out. I don't care for my own sake. I'm thinking of Fay. She'll go through hell when that story breaks."

"Just as long as the story gets me where I want to go I don't care who gets hurt in the process, Larsen. I've got my soap.

"But we're still aboard the trawler and we've got to cross the bar yet," he reminded me, smiling bleakly. "While I was below, I put Fay and Jim into the only two life jackets. They'll float all night when we capsize and the currents'll carry them up onto the beach . . . you and I won't need life jackets, Marlowe. Why not going to hell?"

I shivered at the crazy look on his face.

"No, Marlowe, I've thought it out. Without me, there can be no explanation about how I know how to save us a several others. With the two of us gone, drowned in another bar accident, Fay and Jim will have all the chance they need. They won't drown. I'll see they're well clear of the boat before I ram the bar."

"You're mad!" I retorted, but mad or not, I knew had to do just so he could fling me, protect Fay from a scandal. I felt the hacking lift on my neck.

"We're coming to the bar now," he said matter-of-factly and let go the wheel. The trawler yawed dangerously Chato saluted, he walked towards the companionway leading below. "You can have a go at taking her stories if you like. You won't make it . . . I've got to set Fay and Jim over the side . . ."

"Larsen, for goodness' sake!" I bawled, jumping for the wheel, seizing the white foam of the bar leaping through the darkness. I felt the boat plowing, yawing. I couldn't control her. He started below and I yelled again. "Larsen! You can't do this, man! You'll kill us all!"

He snorted tiredly. "Just you and me, Marlowe."

The boat began to broach, I fought it back to an even keel but couldn't control it. I was drenched in sweat and worry.

"Look! — I wasn't print the story! I won't even write it up till I forget I ever heard of you . . ."

"You say that now, but how about when you're back on dry land, eh? Besides, I told you whether you print it or not, the story'll still come out . . . I can't waste any more time talking. I've got to set Fay and Jim over the side . . ."

"Hello! We're almost on the bar!" Larsen's face was grinned as he glanced ahead. He whipped around to face me, speaking fast.

"You never will never write up that story or tell it to anyone? You give me your word, Marlowe?"

"Hell, yes, you! Come and take this wheel before we go over!"

He shoved me aside, grabbed the wheel as we began to tilt.

I was half-drowned after that. We took the boat in expertly and when we reached the wheel Fay came

BE A REAL MAN AGAIN

POTENT POWERFUL VITAL!
NOW YOU CAN LIVE
THE YOUTHFUL LIFE!

Amazing new V-E Rejuvenating Vitamin Formula! "V-E MAN" takes the last few days in your vital life, makes you feel old and weary again. Now, with "V-E MAN", you can live again, young and vital! "V-E MAN" gives you the power to live again, and again, and again. . . . V-E MAN, your vital life, your young life, your business.

30 DAYS HOME TRIAL
Write today for full details of proven RECOMMENDED V-E PLAN. Send your name and address and we will send you details. The first 1000 names of those who respond will receive books on FREE information. Everything will be sent to you completely paid, plus postage. This plan is free.

NOW I SPEND JUST 3 MINUTES DAILY & DEVELOP A BEAUTIFUL BUST

GET
FREE BOOK!

I guarantee you will add up to 2 inches in 20 days, or I will refund your monetary investment.
Sensational new Saline Green dermalite full, firm, beautiful is a secret, miracle,
GUARANTEED

Details on how to get natural, round and sensuous way to have bust beauty that you always desired. In fact, it is now possible to have busts like the girls in the magazines without the dangerous operations. You can have busts like models as simple as getting dressed.
Write for free, repeated information. No place to buy.

Paula Ray, Sales D.A.S., Box 244
P.O., NORTH SYDNEY.

up from below, but she wasn't wearing a lifejacket. She went to a phone box and called an ambulance and 10 minutes later she rode away in it, holding Lambert's hand. He didn't have a lifejacket on, either.

"You bluffed me!" I accused Lambert angrily. "You never intended drowning them overseas or wrote me out! I should have known you'd never risk my drowning."

"Once back on your word, Lambert?" he asked testily.

I stared at him a long time, slowly shook my head. "No — I'll stick to it, but you're finished, answer. I'll be satisfied to see that. As you said yourself, that arm of Lambert's will start enough questions to bring out everything . . .

"I don't think so — after 20 years, a man's skill must diminish. I did a pretty clumsy job on that artery, not intentionally, of course. I just couldn't help it."

I stared at him incredulously. He was quite calm and confident. He'd pulled a knife to end all kinds and damned if it hadn't worked, with me as the target. He lit a cigarette and walked down the wharf towards the policeman who'd been called. There would be lots of questions to answer, but Lambert wasn't scared of the law — or me.

As I followed slowly, he said, "It was an accident. Jim tripped over the rocks with his knife in his hand . . .

"Okay, Marlowe. What else could I say? Sure, Larsson, an accident. And you did a rough but efficient job."

"To explain if you want to do and write up the story . . . You've just taken part in a first-class drama, Marlowe. I don't think you realize that. A serious accident at sea, a man who'll bleed to death unless rough surgery is used on him immediately, his whole future as an athlete in the balance. The race against time to get ashore, crossing the treacherous bay — Quite a few dramatic ingredients there. Written up properly, it should make first-class reading . . .

Suddenly I realized I had my coat after all . . .

I wrote it up and it made page one. Not headlines, but the front page anyway. It didn't put me back at the top but it boosted me quite a few rungs up the ladder. Hammett's already promised me an office of my own.

Fay and Lambert are married now and after a few more months of rehabilitating physiotherapy, he will be swimming again. I don't know what story Larsson told them about the cause of the fight, but they never mentioned it now.

Larsson still fishes for a living and tries to make out he's still swimming from the bath of a pompous hospital surgeon who told him he was lucky he hadn't crippled Lambert's arm for keeps, setting him up the way he did. But when we're having a quiet beer together we both laugh about it. Oh, yes, you can have a beer now, any time. I can take the drink or leave it alone.

I've made my comeback. And although I'm not yet at the top where I'd been aiming, I've come back from a long, long way away . . .

APPOINTMENT IN TANGIER

(Continued from page 25)

"Ahh, Mr. Hogan," he said firmly, "I am obliged to see you are still alive. I thought . . ."

"Don't hand me that. Lay off the soft soap. This isn't a social call. We have no business. I have some things I want to sell to you."

"Thought? A customer and something else?"

"Your life. I'm offering you a package deal, both at a bargain price."

"Surely the show is on the other foot, Mr. Hogan. I have but to summon Amadeo, and —"

"Amadeo is very tired. He won't wake up for a while."

There was a short silence as Bettina considered this. Then she said, "And what price?"

"Fifteen thousand. Although your life isn't worth the extra five."

"That is a matter of opinion. I have not got 15,000."

"No, but you can get it. I give you two hours. After that, Bettina will send a certain letter, containing all she knows and the heard. She didn't only lie on her back here, you know. Also, I'll be after you, and if the police catch you first, you'll be烹."

"Perhaps we could reduce the price and make the difference your share in a partnership with me, Mr. Hogan. I must confess, your ability and honesty has impressed me —"

"Nothing doing. In the first place, I couldn't trust you as much, and anyway, I don't like drug-dealing. Fifteen thousand, and you have two hours to get it. Starting now."

"You leave me no alternative." He stood up and started to go. Then he turned round and spat. "But you will regret it!"

"Best it before I lose my temper." I said laconically. He grabbed out, and I sat and thought. We didn't have much on him, and if he realized it we could be in an awkward position. Still, the blunt looked as if it would work. There was nothing to do but wait. I helped myself to his whisky and a cigar and settled down with one of his books.

This man collected books — but what books! I was still looking boyishly at the pictures in one called "Pelican," after half an hour. And that was a mistake, because when I looked up, there was a little man looking at me. And I was looking down a pistol barrel.

"Mr. Hogan," he said. "You are under arrest. Would you care to accompany me?"

"No," I said, but I stood up quickly anyway. "Perhaps we could come to an agreement. I can get you a bigger fish for a price."

"Ignore him," said a voice from the French window. It was Bettina also with a gun. "The bigger fish will return shortly anyway."

"Hell," I said. "Do you always turn up like this? Pickaxe this guy and we'll have a go minutes."

"I fear you are mistaken," said

Exciting, Entertaining

PLATING CARDS

It's a pleasure to look upon these cards. Each card is printed on heavy, quality paper. They are mounted on a card mount which holds them flat. The cards are numbered and each card has a small number on the back. The cards are made of high quality paper and are printed in full color.

ANTIQUE CAR REPRODUCTIONS

In full color

Each set contains 100 cards.

Full color reproduction of antique cars.

• The 1923, a 1923 CADILLAC.

• The 1924, a 1924 CADILLAC.

ALYSA SALES

Box 1340, G.W.D., SYRNEY.

NOW . . .

YOU CAN

DECIDE

YES OR NO!

Cookes have found that smoking is possibly one of the greatest foes of the modern woman. It causes wrinkles, slows down metabolism, and creates a sense of depression and indecision.

Motherhood is no more an Accident

This unique precision instrument gives every woman a chance for health and well-being. It guides mothers through the difficult problems of motherhood.

on indicator

Made by same precision engineers who designed the famous Cookes and Cookes' products. Cookes and Cookes' products are recommended by the leading physicians throughout the United States and Canada.

COOKES' TRADING CO.
Dept. J-1
111 Madison Avenue

NEW YORK 16, N.Y.
Please send me information concerning your product and its benefits. Name _____ Address _____ City _____ State _____ ZIP _____

ADAM, June, 1951 55

HOW TO STOP SMOKING

WITHOUT WILL POWER.

Don't let smoking break your love, make your nerves worse, spoil your digestion, affect your health, shorten your life, or damage your teeth. Stop smoking now. Call ENZODES. Long-term Treatment Success stories the telephone. No smoke.

FREE — IF YOU SEND NOW!

Send just money — postage paid. Details will be sent you. Postage paid. Write to: ENZODES, Dept. ADX, FREE. Details printed in post office window. No samples. Enclosed stamp for postage, and address to LUNGSAVER Co., Dept. ADX.

Box 800 G.P.O., SYDNEY
in New Zealand, Box 800 P.O., CHRISTCHURCH.

LONELY?

—Then Let Us
Help You!

At last there is no need to be lonely any longer. You may find that certain women among our many hundred eligible members of the opposite sex. Reconcile your dreams and write us visit us. Friendly, confidential Service and personal Attention. It costs you nothing to inquire and there is certainly no obligation.

ELIGIBLE INTRODUCTION CLIQUE

125 College St., Melbourne, C.I.
If you prefer an appointment phone the Moll, 42-4722.

Stops Bad Breath
INTERNALLY!

YOU SIMPLY CAN'T OFFEND

ENZODES put an End to Odour in Seconds!

Now you can feel really free from all unpleasant odours —whether caused by strong foods, alcohol, cigarettes, smoking, etc. ENZODES removes all odours completely, 14 hours a day when used regularly. Take proven, pleasant-tasting, non-toxic formula for positive protection from against offensive odours.
ENZODES not only removes unpleasant odours, but restores natural and refreshing aromatic taste.
Available from all chemists and druggists.

2/7 per packet

ENZODES
LTD. MELBOURNE, VICTORIA

ENZODES

MARIONA

the little man. "First, we have had an anonymous telephone call that a Mr. Hogan, wanted in France, and a smuggler and murderer, would be found here. I feel it was Battigelli. Second, Mr. Hogan, alias the ex-president Georges Franssen, who is an agent of Interpol, but currently working with us."

"I have not decided what to do with you, Mr. Hogan," said the incomparable Little man. He sat on the other side of a scarred and battered desk in a musty little room in a provincial police station. Outside the Italian number best was making me feel pretty uncomfortable. "We have so much we could do. You are wanted in France as well as here, and I am sure both countries could find a lot of pleasure in extracting more information from you. Enough to keep you out of trouble for a long time."

"Let off some steam," I said. "I'm not one of your cruddy countrymen that you can beat convictions out of."

"I don't think your country would object," he said. "I recall that you are not liked there either."

We both thought that over for a while, and decided he was right. "Stop playing cat and mouse," I said. "Whatever you want to do?"

"After Mr. Hogan, it is not what I want to do." Here it comes, I thought, the this-is-my-life-much-things-ll-happen-now jazz. "I have been instructed to offer you another way of paying your debt to society than the obvious one. You would be interested, of course?"

"Well, he's not a hypocrite after all, I thought, and nodded.

"You are really very small fry, and it is felt that you are not completely unreclaimable. Also, you have talents which could be of use. Battigelli, your employer in that disastrous drug smuggling episode is the main concern. In return for him, Interpol offers you a small sum of money to get out of the country. Provided you do not return without an invitation."

"And my status with Interpol?"

"None. It is thought that you would work better with unofficial freedom."

"And be less embarrassing if anything goes wrong?"

He ignored that. "What is your decision, Mr. Hogan?"

What would you think it would be? *

So there I was on a plane headed toward Tangier, and with a passport, of all things. My great companion was next to me. She was looking cool and beautiful, as usual. "How come you're so beautiful?" I said.

"Please remember ours is a business arrangement. Save YOUR energy."

"You've always telling me that, Rosanna," I said. "I've been going crazy since the first time I saw you. Then I have you on a promise, and what happens? You turn out to be a lady dog and you lied to me. And you haven't paid up on that promise."

"The rat-trap owes nothing to the cat, Mr. Hogan. If we must talk, shall we talk business? Repeat your instructions to me."

"We need the bandwidth time, we know that Battigelli is in Tangier. He knows I have a secret to settle with him. I walk around talking for him and making myself obvious, and when he comes to get me, I nail him."

"If he doesn't nail you first?"

"Yeah. An obvious flaw."

"Only in your opinion. I think it would be a perfect ending."

"Darling, can I kill him?" I said sarcastically. She snarled at me and turned away, so I picked up a shotgun out of the rack and looked at it. I read about five lines and then discovered it was in a language I didn't understand, so I put it back. I twiddled my thumbs.

"Is something making the brave Mr. Hogan nervous?" Rosanna asked.

"Only you," I said. "Let's talk just to kill time." Then I wished I hadn't said kill. It brought back unpleasant thoughts.

"I will only discuss business with you."

"Then tell me more about our plans. Rosanna ma."

"We have one contact. He will find us later. He is an unpleasant man, but one does not change one's allies in employment like this." She looked at me significantly. "He is independently rich and very much the playboy. Detached."

"And he does this just for kicks? Efficient?"

"Repetitive, but I doubt it."

If I can get some money somewhere, I thought, he won't stop me get-away.

"And remember, we are supposed to be man and wife, and I will be with you continuously." I heard. "And if you attempt to leave without fulfilling your bargain, I will shoot you, but not dead." Having delivered this she pinched my ear at me.

Precious dreams, I said to myself and settled down to pretend to nap.

When the time came to find a taxi at the airport we had no trouble. The driver loaded our bags on and we sat back. I looked around and started to figure angles for a quick goodbye.

I began to feel better, so I gave Rosanna a cigarette. Just to show her in advance there were no hard feelings. As I lit up my lighter the driver handed back a page out of a notebook. It had one word on it: Interpol. Rosanna glanced at it. It is from my lighter, and its my signature. I felt worse.

"Well?" asked Rosanna.

"No news, sissoo," said the driver. "Call me Jean-Jean. The ground has been laid for the signatory Rosanna." His bravery did nothing to cheer me up. "The rumor of his arrival and his name has been circulated. Do you like his vehicle?" He stuck his feet down to show us how good it was, and narrowly missed impaling 22 pedestrians in Birdland, I thought.

We did the rest of the trip rocking backwards and forwards in our seats as he tramped on the brakes and the gas station. At last we stopped and I opened my eyes.

"Your hotel," he said. "Please do me the favor of closing with me tonight. I shall pick you up. The manager himself could be continuing his investigations at the moment. Now I must return the vehicle. The owner may have missed it." And he passed the car into the traffic and nearly took the remaining six months off the life of an antiquated Citroen.

"Mad!" said Rossana, as the door-man recovered from his surprise and picked up our bags.

I started my investigation. "Know of a man called Botticelli?" I asked the doorman.

"Non," he said, and only added, "grande" after I tapped him a bit. When he saw the size of it, he wished he hadn't.

Rossana and I dropped the bags in our honeymoon suite and went out.

The afternoon tour produced no information, but plenty of ticks if you're an alcohol. If I'm not now, it wasn't for lack of trying that day. We had to cover as much territory as possible, so it was down with one drink in each place and a fast nap to the next. Rossana wriggled onto some water halfway, but I had to face the music. Finally, when I'd reached my limit and she was visiting more powder rooms than bars, we gave up and went home to recover. She slumped down on the bed and didn't stir when I lay down beside her. Even after a cold shower I didn't have enough energy left to give her anything to object to.

The sun cleared by early evening and we got up and dressed for dinner. By the time we were soon seated I'd eaten enough to make me wish I really was a heavy moon. She caught the look and said "Shall we wait in the lounge?"

Twice sobered, I followed her down. Jean-Jean was waiting, but instead of being a taxi-driver he was a dandified man-about-town, cleaned, polished and lightly oiled. As well as the new clothes he'd put on some vicious wrinkles around his eyes. They didn't go with the rest of his face. He looked at Rossana, mentally stripped her, filed what he saw away for future reference, dressed her smile, and smiled.

"You are to be congratulated on your beauty," he said. "You are a lovely man, Signore Rossini."

"She has her faults," I said. "But thank you." He ushered us out to his car — a Lago-Talbot about 30 feet long. We all sat in the back and I wondered if word need magnetophones to talk to each other, while Jean-Jean made the trip to the chauffeur and told him where to go.

"This is my favorite spot," he explained. "Entertainment which cannot be matched anywhere else in the world is available. Only a few are allowed to enjoy it, even in Tangier. It is very exclusive." Rossana prepared for the worst. Me, the best.

The Lago-Talbot glided to a halt in an quiet side street and we got

ADVENTURERS CLUB

Great new BOOK CLUB for TRAVEL and ADVENTURE

The Adventurers Club is the new and quite different book club for all those who enjoy travel and real-life adventure. The best travel and real-life adventure books are sent to members in their ORIGINAL SIZE — ALL THE ILLUSTRATIONS — THE IDENTICAL TEXT — THE COLORED JACKETS — THE STRONG HARD COVERED BINDING — for only 25¢ each, including postage.

Words cannot convey the superiority of the Adventurers Club, but the books can, and they are at bargain prices.

Act quickly — complete the enrollment form now — checks are desired.

Here is our immediate listing of Club book releases from the exciting program.

★ LOST WORLD OF THE BABINAS

GERALD FAYELL — 31,000 —
Author of a classic for the library, the adventure, the science and the historical. In the depths of the Amazon jungle, a young American scientist explores the primitive mystery of the lost-known land of a dark continent.

★ THE STAR SAPPHIRES

GERALD FAYELL — When Judge Sparrow was released by the Indians he had to find a way to earn a living. So he set out to find a unique sapphire deposit, leaving the most dangerous leading in the world.

★ THE PUMA'S CLAW

KENNY CLARK — 32,000 — Performed by our own Clark. The tension, drama and fun of a suspenseful adventure that will keep you on the edge of your seat. Pumas to conquer an unbroken land in Northern Peru.

— HOW TO JOIN —

To THE ADVENTURERS CLUB
122 Clarence Street, SYDNEY.

I will join the Adventurers Club, except at least two monthly books and thereafter give one month's notice if I wish to resign.

I will pay 25¢, including postage, on receipt of each book.
 Enclosed is $0.75 for six books.

Please use BLOCK letters

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

TOWN _____ STATE _____

SIGNATURE _____

out. Jean-Jean did a quick knock on an unmarked door, and a slit opened.

"This is the dining room," said Jean-Jean. "The gaming room is on your left. The inner sanctum is ahead. Come."

"The Dober-sher," said Jean-Jean, and pointed his finger through the mesh curtains on the other side of the table. He was already absorbed in it.

It was a symbolic ballet of the seven veils danced by a beautiful small redheaded girl, a giant Ethiopian, who was taking the veil off her. They danced round circular velvet bed in the middle of the dance floor; she ran, but never fast enough to escape. He pursued, but never fast enough to grab all the veils at once.

"She is a Berger, that is why her skin is pink and the hair red," said Jean-Jean, without looking away. The Ethiopian finally managed to get the last veil off as he caught her.

The lights faded into almost imperceptible darkness and I dragged my eyes away — Rossana managed it a second later and forced her face into a coldly bored look. Jean-Jean was still staring fixedly when another portion came in with a menu.

We ordered and Jean-Jean passed the menu to let us choose our desserts. Below the list of cheeses and creams were a bunch of names — Lipski, Marlowe, and so on. He took it back, drew a ring round "Marie" and handed it to a passing waiter with the order.

Marie turned up with the cheeses, a box of cigars, stockings, high-heeled shoes and not much else. We filled the little glasses, selected our creams and looked at her. Rossana drained her glass and said, "Excuse me, I need fresh air. Would you accompany me, Dick?"

Jean-Jean said "There is no ..." and looked hurt and disappointed. "Well, if you must, walk with me in the gaming room. I shall find you later. Please feel free to use my credit there." And he slipped an arm round Marie.

I looked suddenly disappointed, which was much less than I felt, and escorted Rossana out. The curtains closed behind us, cutting off Marie's gaze in mid-scream.

I made free use of the credit, and won a bit, even after paying back. Rossana had rounds, and wouldn't. She took a pic. That's justice for you. We killed away a few hours, had a few dances and drinks, and the not more than were appropriate. At last we got a note saying "Waited 90 minutes." Apologized. Jean-Jean "We apologize too, and left.

Conveniently, there was a taxi at the door. We got in, and he took off, no directions, nothing.

"That man has a genius for retortation," I said. "Among other things ..." Rossana gave me a strained look. The taxi driver said nothing. We hurtled round back streets and alleys and finally pulled up. The driver peeked in a door, said: "Knock three times at five-second intervals." Hit it out and left at high speed.

I knocked, feeling a bit like a spy in a cheap thriller, the door opened and we went into a darkened vestibule. Another door was open into a dimly lit room. Obviously we were meant to go in. As we did, the door shut and the lights came on.

Batticelli sat facing us.

"Good evening, Mr. Regan and Rossana. Please do not move, as my valet — Amador, you remember — will shoot if you do." I looked over my shoulder and down the barrel of a gun. "Please separate so that I may see you up, Mr. Regan, sit in that chair." He moved over to Rossana, and pushed her wrists behind her. She kicked at his shin. Without taking the eyes off me, Amador stood over and grabbed her under the ear. Batticelli rubbed his chin, murmured "Cristo, America," and tied her hands and feet. Then he came over to me.

Amador was an expert. He had hard enough to hurt, but not to damage. Just for a change, he held my hand past by the hair and slapped my windpipe with his gun barrel. I was beginning to think it would be a long, painful process. When I wasn't so busy fighting for air that I could think.

"Stop!" said a calm voice at the door.

"Jean-Jean," said Rossana.

I laboriously lifted my head and looked. It was Jean-Jean all right, complete with four Arabs and a Tommy gun. I tried to speak, but couldn't. Not even a snore.

"I have looked forward to meeting you, Batticelli," he said. "Business rivals are always pleasant to meet — once. Besides, you almost managed to interrupt one of my drug shipments. You know of a leak in my organization. You will tell me soon."

Now I knew why he was independently wealthy. "I would prefer you didn't tell me at once. My Tunisians need some friends."

"But first, we will tie up the loose ends," and he pointed to Amador. One of the Tunisians stepped behind him, grabbed his face and used a knife down inside his ribcage. He collapsed without a sound. "And now you, Dick Regan. Your usefulness as a decoy is ended. Knock him out," he finished in French.

The last thing I felt was the thud on the back of my neck.

Slowly, I began to hear a gentle purring and I forced myself to keep my eyes shut. Then I felt the cushions and the movement, and I knew I was in a car. I was still tied up, so I stayed slumped and tried to sleep my dream.

We stopped and somebody said something, and was answered, in an un-understandable language. Then I was pushed behind the wheel, and one set of clattered feet passed over, while my hands were being untied. I raised my eyes open as he started on my feet, and as soon as they were free I brought my knee up as hard as I could. The hard road made a satisfyingly crunching sound as it hit the underside of the wooden roof ledge. I dragged him inside, found his pistol, and set back to recover.

Very soon another car touched bumpers with us from behind, and started to nudge us toward the cliff edge. So that was the trick — push us over a cliff and make it look like an accident. I would sort that out immediately. I yanked the cracked pistol from Batticelli, and when my remaining fingers struck the head at the window to see what had happened, I poked him in the teeth with the pistol barrel.

"Speak English — François?" I asked.

"François," he said weakly, gritting out a tooth.

I hit him across the bridge of the nose and got out and trashed him while he was still dazed. "Good," I said in French. "Accord me to where we came from," and ushered him into the rear car.

I recognized the street as he turned into it, and when he slowed down, I stopped him, grabbed the wheel and turned the ignition off.

Rossana was still there and all right. The Tunisians were dragging at the last couple of reeders and opening her. Some gruff sounds were filtering out from the other room. The Tunisians stamped their boots and muttered away in a blurb in their own language, then broke into their faltered French.

"I feel terrible," said one.

"I know what you need." They spoke English, obviously for Rossana's benefit, so that she could guess what was coming.

"A glass of water would do." Playing cat and mouse.

"No water is available. The bushes are sharper in their eyes. They turned to Rossana: "Take off your clothes."

"Her hands are tied."

One moved over and cut her bands apart. "Take off your clothes." Rossana didn't move. I got ready to move in. The Tunisian grabbed her neckline and tore her dress off. I took a head off him.

"I told you not to touch her. She is mine," said Jean-Jean from the other doorway.

The Tunisians turned and stared with their crossed eyes. Jean-Jean strolled over to Rossana. "You are more beautiful than I had imagined," he said. They were the last words he spoke. One Tunisian calmly shot him at the base of the spine. Before Jean-Jean's body hit the floor my pistol exploded twice. Both Arabs staggered and died. Rossana fainted.

After we'd recuperated for a day we gave up our auto and flew back to Italy. I was looking forward to continuing our recuperation, but Rossana said she had a report to file, and that she'd be in a couple of days. She did — in the little postmen's office.

"Officially, of course, Mr. Regan, you did not complete your mission satisfactorily," he said. "You left no information about the organization. However, the contract will be honored. There is a ticket to Sicilia and some spending money." He smiled and stood up. "Officially, allow me to thank you for intervening to save my business as you did."

Rossana looked interested. I hoped. That's women for you.

The better your morning shower . . . the better you feel all day . . .

GET THE "look- alive" look with a SHAVEMASTER shave

You look fine, feel fine, when you come alive each day the Shavemaster "Look-Alive" way. Brisk as a morning shower . . . cool as a pool on a hot day. Grab yourself a man-size Sunbeam shave to get real on-top-of-the-world satisfaction. After a Shavemaster shave you feel alive and man . . . you look alive!

Sunbeam SUPER-SMOOTH SHAVEMASTER

The secret is in the deep shave — below the bladeplate.

Shavemaster combines the top features of all shaving methods. More than rounded head, with tapered John Deere® whisker traps, the Shavemaster bladeplate slices the beard like a scythe. That's right. TRY! No man of the better classes has a finer and smoother shave. Or take a Shavemaster home with you for a 30 DAY FREE TRIAL.

Shaver Price
(all models)
Shaver Series of Double Action in Large Pack in Small Pack
in Economy Pack

NOTHING SHAVES LIKE SHAVEMASTER

© 1951 P&P

the Forbidden Secrets of Life are daringly revealed!

POST
COUPON
BELOW NOW!

ADDITIONAL UNUSUAL BOOKS YOU MAY ORDER "WHAT EVERY MARRIED MAN & WOMAN SHOULD KNOW"

by Dr. R. Martin

Here Are The Books That Study Life With 2000+ Facts, Figures & A Theory of Life... As Well As Methods of Understanding Life... With Answers to Many Questions That You Have Always Wanted To Know.

WHAT EVERY MARRIED WOMAN SHOULD KNOW About What Every Married Man Should Know, By Dr. R. Martin

EAACH BOOK 20/-
POST FREE

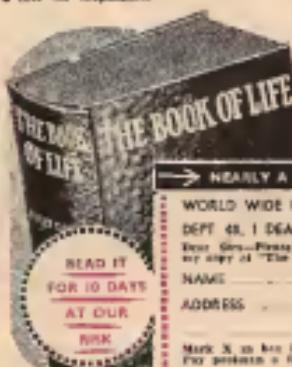

PARTIAL LIST OF CONTENTS

- Pre-Marital Examinations
- Advice in the Marriage Period
- Mental Consideration
- The Art of Parenting
- The Signs of Maturity
- Care of the Physical Woman
- Doctors' Periodic Exams
- Sexes and Sex Matters
- Greatest Growth of the Child
- Male Circumcision
- Childless Marriages
- Births
- Infertility
- Separate Homes
- Experiential Motherhood
- A Voluntary Guide
- Inter-racial Marriages
- The Working Wife
- Woman's Air, etc.

Each Book 20/-, post free. 40 8000 C.O.D.

DO YOU KNOW?

- The Secrets of Sex Attraction?
- Why Men Commit Love Affairs?
- The Psychology of Jealousy?
- What Is the Sexual Revolution?
- What Makes Us Love?
- Men & Women Do Insecurities?
- How to Make a Good Marriage?
- The Secret of Happiness?
- The Infinite Secrets That Women Marriage?
- How to Make Marriage Money?
- The Woman's Way of Freedoms?
- Love the Responsibility?

FEARLESS BOOK ON LIFE!

This book is a fearless, unaging challenge to jealousy and suspicion. It contains the fruits of a lifelong study of one of the biggest problems confronting the young married and unmarried world. In writing it the author has spared consideration to tell people what they really needed to know about themselves. He has had to surmount extraordinary difficulties in the preparation of this book. Many of the topics discussed had never before appeared in a book intended for popular consumption. But the truth is awful. It can neither be ignored nor suppressed. There was an overwhelming need and demand for a fearless, plain speaking book on marriage. The wall of ignorance that was keeping millions of lives must be broken down. This fearless book is the outcome.

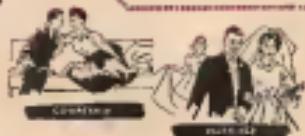

BOTH PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

"The Book of Life" enters the sanctuary of the most sacred phase of your inner life. It gives you with suggestions that are personal and confidential, it furnishes details and practical information on vital subjects pertaining to themselves, that are frequently responded with vulgar mystery.

MONEY-BACK GUARANTEE

If, in your opinion, this book does not measure up to expectation, when you return it to us, we will refund the money you paid for it. You can be sure books of its value to you. They are being written — You have everything to gain — Get your copy in the page below!

- How to Build Virtue?
- Sex Security Provided?
- The Biological Bulletin?
- Men Possess Sex Sublimity?
- Women As One-Man Content?
- The Purpose of Female Lovemaking?
- The Marks of Adultery Lovemaking?
- The Faculty of Passion Lovemaking?
- The Biology of Normal Matrices and Excess?
- Clarity, the Foundation of Ignorance?

HOW TO GET YOUR COPY QUICKEST!
Put 20/- in your name and address, and mail to:
DEPT. 48, 1 DEAN PLACE, SYDNEY, N.S.W.
"Send it C.O.D." Address to:

WORLD WIDE MAIL ORDER PTY. LTD.,
Dept. 48, 1 Dean Place, Sydney, NSW.

→ NEARLY A QUARTER OF A MILLION FACTS ←

WORLD WIDE MAIL ORDER PTY. LTD.

DEPT. 48, 1 DEAN PLACE, SYDNEY, N.S.W.

Dear Sirs—Please send under plain envelope by return post my copy of "The Book of Life". I enclose 20/- as full payment.

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

Mark X in box if I do not wish C.O.D. ADV. 10/-

For postpaid + five pence extra postage